SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the “Paycheck Fairness Act”.

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

Congress finds the following:

- (1) Women have entered the workforce in record numbers over the past 50 years.
- (2) Despite the enactment of the Equal Pay Act of 1963, many women continue to earn significantly lower pay than men for equal work. These pay disparities exist in both the private and governmental sectors.
- (3) In many instances, the pay disparities can only be due to continued intentional discrimination or the lingering effects of past discrimination. After controlling for educational attainment, occupation, industry, union status, race, ethnicity, and labor force experience roughly 40 percent of the pay gap remains unexplained.
- (4) The existence of such pay disparities—
 - (A) depresses the wages of working families who rely on the wages of all members of the family to make ends meet;
 - (B) undermines women’s retirement security, which is often based on earnings while in the workforce;
 - (C) prevents women from realizing their full economic potential, particularly in terms of labor force participation and attachment;
 - (D) has been spread and perpetuated, through commerce and the channels and instrumentalities of commerce, among the workers of the several States;
 - (E) burdens commerce and the free flow of goods in commerce;
 - (F) constitutes an unfair method of competition in commerce;
 - (G) tends to cause labor disputes, as evidenced by the tens of thousands of charges filed with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission against employers between 2010 and 2016;
 - (H) interferes with the orderly and fair marketing of goods in commerce; and
 - (I) in many instances, may deprive workers of equal protection on the basis of sex in violation of the 5th and 14th Amendments to the Constitution.
- (5)(A) Artificial barriers to the elimination of discrimination in the payment of wages on the basis of sex continue to exist decades after the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 (29 U.S.C. 201 et seq.) and the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (42 U.S.C. 2000a et seq.).
 - (B) These barriers have resulted, in significant part, because the Equal Pay Act of 1963 has not worked as Congress originally intended. Improvements and modifications to the law are necessary to ensure that the Act provides effective protection to those subject to pay discrimination on the basis of their sex.
 - (C) Elimination of such barriers would have positive effects, including—
 - (i) providing a solution to problems in the economy created by unfair pay disparities;
 - (ii) substantially reducing the number of working women earning unfairly low wages, thereby reducing the dependence on public assistance;
 - (iii) promoting stable families by enabling all family members to earn a fair rate of pay;
 - (iv) remedying the effects of past discrimination on the basis of sex and ensuring that in the future workers are afforded equal protection on the basis of sex; and
 - (v) ensuring equal protection pursuant to Congress’ power to enforce the 5th and 14th Amendments to the Constitution.
- (6) The Department of Labor and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission carry out functions to help ensure that women receive equal pay for equal work.
- (7) The Department of Labor is responsible for—
 - (A) collecting and making publicly available information about women’s pay;
 - (B) ensuring that companies receiving Federal contracts comply with anti-discrimination affirmative action requirements of Executive Order 11246 (relating to equal employment opportunity);
 - (C) disseminating information about women’s rights in the workplace;

(D) helping women who have been victims of pay discrimination obtain a remedy; and

(E) investigating and prosecuting systemic gender based pay discrimination involving government contractors.

(8) The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission is the primary enforcement agency for claims made under the Equal Pay Act of 1963, and issues regulations and guidance on appropriate interpretations of the law.

(9) Vigorous implementation by the Department of Labor and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, increased information as a result of the amendments made by this Act, wage data, and more effective remedies, will ensure that women are better able to recognize and enforce their rights.

(10) Certain employers have already made great strides in eradicating unfair pay disparities in the workplace and their achievements should be recognized.

SEC. 3. ENHANCED ENFORCEMENT OF EQUAL PAY REQUIREMENTS.

(a) BONA FIDE FACTOR DEFENSE AND MODIFICATION OF SAME ESTABLISHMENT REQUIREMENT.—Section 6(d)(1) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 (29 U.S.C. 206(d)(1)) is amended—

Such defense shall not apply where the employee demonstrates that an alternative employment practice exists that would serve the same business purpose without producing such differential and that the employer has refused to adopt such alternative practice.

“(C) For purposes of subparagraph (A), employees shall be deemed to work in the same establishment if the employees work for the same employer at workplaces located in the same county or similar political subdivision of a State. The preceding sentence shall not be construed as limiting broader applications of the term ‘establishment’ consistent with rules prescribed or guidance issued by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.”

(c) ENHANCED PENALTIES.—Section 16(b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 (29 U.S.C. 216(b)) is amended—

PURPOSE

When President John F. Kennedy signed the Equal Pay Act of 1963 (EPA) into law, he observed that the statute “adds to our laws another structure basic to democracy” and “affirms our determination that when women enter the labor force, they will find equality in their pay envelope.”¹ Fifty-six years later, women have made tremendous progress in the workplace. Women comprise almost half of this country’s workforce and own more than 11 million businesses.² Despite these gains, women continue to be held back by wage discrimination. Because of loopholes in the law and weak sanctions for violations, the EPA is ineffective in combating unequal pay. Women working full time, year-round earn, on average, 80 cents for every dollar earned by a White man.³ H.R. 7, the Pay-check Fairness Act (the Act), modernizes the EPA and brings the country one step closer to ensuring that women receive equal pay for equal work.

The long-term impact of pay disparity on women’s lifetime earnings is substantial, costing a woman anywhere from $400,000⁴ to $2 million⁵ over the course of her career. H.R. 7 will strengthen the EPA to make it a more effective means to combat wage discrimination on the basis of gender. Specifically, the Act builds upon the EPA and closes loopholes that have enabled unscrupulous employers to evade liability under the law. The Act prohibits retaliation against workers who discuss or disclose salary information;⁶ prohibits seeking or relying on pay history in considering an individual for prospective employment; expands the definition of “establishment” so that an employee can find a comparator at any workplace in the same county or political subdivision; clarifies that an employer’s affirmative defense of any “factor other than sex” must be related to the job in question and consistent with business necessity; reforms the EPA’s collective action standard so that women with claims of unequal pay will automatically be part of a class action lawsuit unless they choose to “opt-out” of the case; equalizes damages for discrimination based on sex with damages for discrimination based on race and national origin; and authorizes the U.S. Department of Labor (Department of Labor) to award competitive grants to be used for salary negotiation education and training programs. The Act amends Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (Title VII) to expand the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission’s (EEOC) authority to collect pay data from certain employers in addition to data already collected from employers on employment by race, gender, and national origin.⁷ This will help employers and the relevant enforcement agencies identify unknown gender-based pay discrimination. The Act also strengthens the role government will play in combating wage discrimination. The Act authorizes additional training for EEOC staff on recognizing and remedying wage discrimination; codifies the Bureau of Labor Statistics’ collection of data on female workers that compares them to their male counterparts as part of the Current Employment Statis-⁶Section 3(b)(2) of the amendment in the nature of a substitute provides that employees who have access to wage information of other employees as part of an essential job function are not protected if they disclose the wages to workers who do not otherwise have access to such information. Their wage disclosures are protected if: they reveal that information to an employee who also has access to that data, divulge their own wages, or disclose wages in response to or in furtherance of a government or internal employer investigation.

The bill was referred to the House Committee on Education and Labor. On Wednesday, February 13, 2019, the House Committee on Education and Labor held a joint legislative hearing in the Subcommittee on Workforce Protections and the Subcommittee on Civil Rights and Human Services (Joint Subcommittee Hearing) entitled “Paycheck Fairness Act (H.R. 7): Equal Pay for Equal Work.” The Committee heard testimony on how the weaknesses in the EPA have left the law ineffective in preventing gender-based wage discrimination. Olson, Partner at Seyfarth Shaw, LLP; Kristin Rowe-Finkbeiner, CEO of Moms Rising; and Jenny Yang, Partner at Working Ideal.

On Tuesday, February 26, 2019, the House Committee on Education and Labor met for a full committee markup of H.R. 7, the Paycheck Fairness Act. The Committee adopted an amendment in the nature of a substitute (ANS) offered by Congressman Robert C. “Bobby” Scott (D–VA–3), Chairman, and reported the bill favorably, as amended, to the House of Representatives by a vote of 27–19.

The ANS incorporates the provisions of H.R. 7 with the following modifications:

- It makes a number of technical corrections throughout the bill to ensure that congressional intent is clear.
- It updates Section 2, the findings section, to add evidence supporting the existence of the gender pay gap and evidence of the impact of the gender pay gap.
- It amends Section 5 to authorize grants for a negotiation and skills training program that aims to address all pay disparities, including through outreach to women and girls, and to provide the U.S. Secretary of Labor (Secretary of Labor) 18 months, instead of one year, to report to Congress on the effectiveness of the training program.
- It amends Section 6 to provide the Secretary of Labor 18 months, instead of one year, to implement the bills' research and education provisions, and it eliminates a requirement for the Secretary of Labor to conduct a national convening.
- It amends Section 7 to clarify that the National Pay Equity award is issued on an annual basis to one employer.
- It amends Section 11 to change the authorization of appropriations from $15 million to "such sums as are necessary" to carry out the Act.
- It adds Section 14, a standard severability clause.

The following amendments to the ANS were offered, but not adopted:

- Congressman Bradley Byrne (R-AL-1) offered an amendment to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 (FLSA) to limit "reasonable" attorney's fees in the event of a contingency fee case to no more than 15 percent of any judgment award to a plaintiff. The amendment failed by a vote of 21-25.

- Congressman Rick Allen (R-GA-12) offered an amendment to direct the Secretary of Labor to study and report back to Congress no later than 90 days after enactment a study to determine the effect of amendments made under section 3 (bona fide factor defense, non-retaliation, enhanced penalties) on employers' ability to recruit, hire, promote, and increase the pay of employees irrespective of gender. If the Secretary finds the amendments are likely to significantly hinder employers' ability to recruit, hire, promote, and increase the pay of employees irrespective of gender, the amendments made by the section would not go into effect. The amendment failed by a vote of 20-25.

- Congressman Byrne offered an amendment to strike language in the ANS that allows a defense to gender-based pay differences based on a "bona fide factor other than sex, such as education, training or experience" and replace it with ambiguous language allowing a defense to gender-based discrimination based on "a bona fide business-related reason other than sex." Accompanying that change, the Byrne amendment would have stripped out conditions establishing when such bona fide factor defense would apply. The amendment failed by a vote of 19-26.

- Congresswoman Virginia Foxx (R-NC-5), Ranking Member, offered an amendment to strike Section 8 relating to pay data collection by the EEOC. The amendment failed by a vote of 18-27.

SUMMARY

Neither the EPA nor Title VII is sufficient in their current forms to achieve wage equality. The EPA prohibits gender-based wage discrimination between men and women in the same establishment who perform jobs that require substantially equal skill, effort, and responsibility under similar working conditions. Under the EPA, an aggrieved person has two years (or three years in a case of a willful violation) from the date of any instance of unequal pay to file a claim in court.¹⁰ Under the EPA, there is no requirement to seek any remedies through the EEOC first. A plaintiff does not bear the burden of proving that the employer intentionally committed wage-based gender discrimination, but employers have a very broad business necessity defense for “factors other than sex.” A plaintiff who successfully proves wage discrimination under the EPA can recover back pay, and the EPA also provides for liquidated damages in an amount equal to back pay, unless the employer can show that it acted in good faith and it had reasonable grounds to believe that its actions did not violate the EPA.¹¹

Title VII also has limitations when it comes to closing the gender wage gap. Title VII prohibits discrimination based on race, color, national origin, religion, and sex. To bring a case of wage discrimination under Title VII, a plaintiff must prove intentional discrimination. Before bringing a case to court, a claimant must exhaust administrative remedies through the EEOC. Cases under Title VII must be filed with the EEOC within 180 days of the violation, or longer in states where there is a state fair employment practices law.¹² Although a plaintiff bringing a gender-based wage discrimination claim is entitled to back pay, compensatory damages,¹³ and punitive damages,¹⁴ compensatory and punitive damages do have monetary caps. These caps apply only to gender-based discrimination, and they vary depending on the size of the employer,¹⁵ but under no circumstance can these damages exceed $300,000.¹⁶ However, wage discrimination claims based upon race and national origin are uncapped, creating a two-tiered system where pay discrimination based on race and national origin is considered more egregious than pay discrimination based on sex. This has been the case since enactment of the Civil Rights Act of 1991.

Due to weaknesses in the EPA, the landmark legislation has not lived up to its original purpose. Women working full-time earned just 58.9 cents to the dollar that men earned when the EPA was passed in 1963. The wage gap has narrowed somewhat since then, but it persists as a significant problem for American women. Today, women earn, on average, 80 cents for every dollar that a White man earns.¹⁷ The wage gap is even more substantial for some groups of women. For every dollar paid to White, non-Hispanic men, Black women typically make only 61 cents, Latina women only 53 cents, and American Indian or Alaskan Native women only 58 cents.¹⁸ H.R. 7 is a critical step forward in the fight to eliminate pay disparity that “depresses wages and living standards for employees necessary for their health and efficiency; prevents maximum utilization of the available labor resources; tends to cause labor disputes, thereby burdening, affecting, and obstructing commerce; and constitutes an unfair method of competition.”¹⁹ Congress has a responsibility to modernize the EPA so that it can better achieve its intended purpose.

COMMITTEE VIEWS

The Committee on Education and Labor is committed to protecting the rights of individuals in the workplace. Fifty-six years after the passage of the EPA, women continue to earn less than men for the same work. The long-term impact of pay disparity on women's earnings is substantial. Many women have been unable to utilize the protections afforded under the EPA because loopholes, court interpretations, and ineffective sanctions have made enforcement extremely difficult. H.R. 7 strengthens the EPA to more effectively combat wage discrimination. The Act builds upon Congress' efforts 56 years ago when the EPA was enacted and is a necessary step forward to close the persistent wage gap between men and women.

HISTORY OF THE EQUAL PAY ACT

In 1963, Congress first addressed the issue of unequal pay²⁰ when it passed the EPA as an amendment to the FLSA.²¹ The purpose of the legislation was broadly remedial to eliminate once and for all gender-based discriminatory pay practices:

The objective of the legislation is to ensure that those who perform tasks which are determined to be equal shall be paid equal wages. The wage structure of all too many segments of American industry has been based on an ancient but outmoded belief that a man, because of his role in society, should be paid more than a woman even though his duties are the same. This bill would provide, in effect, that such an outmoded belief can no longer be implemented and that equal work will be rewarded with equal wages.²²

The EPA enshrined “equal work for equal pay regardless of sex” alongside minimum wages, overtime pay, and the protection of child laborers as a fair labor standard in the FLSA.²³ Other versions of equal pay legislation had been introduced prior to and during 1963, but because the Department of Labor had already developed “a now familiar system of regulations and procedures for investigation, administration, and enforcement,” Congress decided that a simple expansion of the FLSA to include pay equity was the “most efficient and least difficult course of action.”²⁴ Upon introduction of the bill, Senator Patrick McNamara (D–MI) stated:

Such a utilization serves two purposes: First, it eliminates the need for a new bureaucratic structure to enforce equal pay legislation. And second, compliance should be made easier because of both industry and labor’s long-established familiarity with existing fair labor standards provisions.²⁵

Some legislators felt that the legislation did not go far enough but voted for it nonetheless because it was “a good start . . . in eliminating the unfairness of unequal pay.”²⁶

In passing the EPA, Congress intended that “men and women doing the same job under the same working conditions . . . receive equal pay.”²⁷ Congressman Rodney Frelinghuysen (R–NJ–11) elaborated on the standard:

[T]he jobs in dispute must be the same in work content, effort, skill and responsibility requirements, and in working conditions . . . it is not intended to compare unrelated jobs or jobs that have been historically and normally considered by the industry to be different.²⁸

²⁰Support for “equal pay” dates back to World War I when the War Board enforced regulations requiring pay equity; see Elizabeth Wyman, The Current Framework of Sex/Gender Discrimination Law: The Unenforced Promise of Equal Pay Acts: A National Problem and Possible Solution from Maine, 55 Me. L. Rev. 23 (2004).

At the same time, “equal pay for equal work” did not mean that the jobs in question had to be identical. They were to be similar in terms of “work content, effort, skill and responsibility requirements and in working conditions.”²⁹

In addition, the floor debate made clear that under the EPA, discrimination against one individual would be actionable, and a showing of a pattern and practice of discrimination would not be required. Senator McNamara stated:

It is inconceivable that this Congress should write legislation that would permit selective discrimination which, without doubt, would occur mostly likely against those individuals who are least able to protest. It is certainly the intent of the Senate that an employer will have violated this act if he discriminates against one employee, just as he will violate it if he discriminates against many.³⁰

While the EPA was aimed at eradicating wage differentials based on sex, it was not intended to limit other kinds of pay inequity. As such, even though the female employee might show that the employer’s wages were unequal as compared to a man, the EPA does provide employers with affirmative defenses to justify the differences in pay if such differences are based on: (1) seniority systems; (2) merit systems; (3) methods that measure earnings by quality or quantity of production; or (4) “any factor other than sex.”³¹

While the “any factor other than sex” affirmative defense was broadly written, Congress intended that any proffered reason for a pay differential be a bona fide one. Also, the drafters made sure that the employer shouldered the burden of proving the legitimacy of its practice,³² making clear that these affirmative defenses were never intended to “shield employers who have a plan or system in place that is devised to evade the law.”³³

EPA, TITLE VII, AND SECTION 1981

On July 2, 1964, President Lyndon Johnson signed the Civil Rights Act of 1964³⁴ into law. It was historic legislation prohibiting discrimination in employment, among other things, on the basis of race, color, religion, national origin, and sex.³⁵ The EPA and Title VII, passed only one year apart, both prohibited sex discrimination in pay and provided overlapping coverage.

Before the Civil Rights Act of 1991 amended Title VII, White women could only recover equitable relief for intentional sex discrimination.³⁶ Although the Civil Rights Act of 1991 allowed women to recover compensatory and punitive damages for intentional sex discrimination, the damages were capped at a maximum award of $300,000 and were based upon the size of the employer rather than the amount of harm to the victim.³⁷ During the two years of debate, Congress acknowledged that caps on damages for victims of sex discrimination created a two-tiered system where damages for sex discrimination were less than damages available for race and national origin discrimination. Congress considered and ultimately rejected uncapped damages in cases of sex discrimination as part of a compromise to avoid a presidential veto by President George H.W. Bush.³⁸ The judgment made by Congress established a “disparate treatment of the law which seems to imply that some forms of discrimination are more tolerable than others.”³⁹

Eighteen years after Congress acknowledged that it was creating a two-tiered system of damages where discrimination based upon race and national origin is elevated over discrimination based on gender, distinct differences remain between the application of Title VII and the EPA in sex-based wage discrimination cases.⁴⁰ Key differences are outlined below.

Statute of Limitations/Exhaustion of Administrative Remedies. Under the EPA, an aggrieved person has two years (or three years in a case of a willful violation) from the date of any instance of unequal pay to file a claim in court.⁴¹ The Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act of 2009 directly addressed the 180-day statute of limitation established in Ledbetter v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Company, Inc., where the U.S. Supreme Court found that Lilly Ledbetter’s equal pay claim was time-barred due to it being filed more than 180 days after the initial act of discrimination.⁴² The Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act of 2009 now enables workers to file Title VII pay discrimination claims 180 days from the last discriminatory paycheck as opposed to 180 days from when the discrimination first began.⁴³

Burden of Proof. When alleging discrimination under the EPA, an employee is required to show that a man and a woman working in the same establishment and doing substantially similar jobs are receiving unequal pay. However, she does not bear the burden of proving that the employer intentionally committed wage-based gender discrimination. Once the employee has made a showing of unequal pay, the burden of proof shifts to the employer to show that the pay inequity is not due to gender discrimination.⁴⁴

In contrast, a plaintiff under Title VII must typically prove that the employer engaged in intentional discrimination against her, and she retains the burden of proving discrimination throughout the case. However, unlike an EPA complainant, a Title VII plaintiff is not required to demonstrate that she performed substantially similar (or equal) work as higher paid males, so long as she has other evidence of discrimination such as proof that a man worked fewer hours or evidence that she would have been paid more had she been a man.⁴⁵

Damages. A plaintiff who successfully proves gender-based wage discrimination under the EPA can only recover backpay, and, unless the employer can show that it acted in good faith, an equal amount in liquidated damages.⁴⁶ Conversely, under Title VII, a prevailing plaintiff for a gender-based wage claim is entitled to back pay, compensatory damages,⁴⁷ and punitive damages⁴⁸ for intentional wage discrimination.⁴⁹ However, as noted above, there are monetary caps on compensatory and punitive damages, which vary depending on the size of the employer rather than the extent of a victim's injuries.⁵⁰ However, in no event may these damages exceed $300,000.⁵¹

Section 1981. While Section 1981 of the Civil Rights Act of 1866 (Section 1981) does not cover sex-based discrimination, it is worth comparing as well. Section 1981 forbids discrimination on the basis of race or national origin in the making and enforcement of contracts.⁵² Such contracts may be between employee and employer or between businesses. Plaintiffs in Section 1981 cases may recover compensatory and punitive damages, and like those claims under Title VII, the damages are not limited. Thus, under current law, an employee receiving unequal pay for equal work on the basis of race or national origin may recover punitive damages without an arbitrary statutory limit, but an employee receiving unequal pay on the basis of sex cannot. In this way, limitations on damage awards based on gender are considered by some to be another form of discrimination based upon sex.

WOMEN CONTINUE TO EARN LESS THAN MEN

While progress has been made, equal pay for women is not yet a reality. Kristin Rowe-Finkbeiner testified at the Joint Subcommittee Hearing about a woman named Valerie who discovered this firsthand:

[She] discovered that the male co-worker who had been hired on the same day she was hired was being paid substantially more, even though they had the same job title and she had more duties and responsibilities. Valerie went directly to the owner to request an increase to match her co-worker's wage. She was told because her co-worker was married and male, he "needed" a higher income than she did. Valerie pointed out that since he was married and his wife also worked outside the house, he actually had two incomes to cover his bills; while she was single and struggling to keep her head above water. Her boss was cordial but adamant that that was his policy, and she had no choice but to live with it.⁵³

As previously noted, a woman working full-time, year-round earns 80 cents for every dollar a White male makes.⁵⁴ This gap can cause significant economic loss for a working woman over the course of her career. For example, a woman working full-time and year-round earning the median income for women would lose $403,440 in earnings over a 40-year career.⁵⁵ To make up for this gap in lifetime earnings, this working woman would have to work ten years longer than her White male counterpart.⁵⁶ The gender wage gap's ultimate result is lower lifetime earnings for women, and as a result of these lower lifetime earnings, women's retirement savings and social security benefits are greatly affected.⁵⁷ In 2011, women aged 65 and older received a total income of $22,069 on average as compared to $41,134 for men.⁵⁸ The average Social Security benefit is $14,044 for women as compared to $18,173 for men of the same age.⁵⁹ Because of the gender wage gap, the economy as a whole suffers. For example, researchers estimate that in 2016, the U.S. economy would have produced additional income of $512.6 billion if women received equal pay—an amount equivalent to 2.8 percent of the 2016 gross domestic product (GDP).⁶⁰ In addition to boosting the economy, pay equity would cut the poverty rate for all working women by more than half, from 8 percent to 3.8 percent.⁶¹

Research indicates that women experience a pay gap in nearly every line of work, regardless of education, experience, occupation, industry, and job title.⁶² In fact, 38 percent of the pay gap remains unexplained even when accounting for these variables.⁶³ “Most researchers attribute this portion [of the wage gap] to factors such as discrimination and socially constructed gender norms . . .”⁶⁴ The wage gap remains even when controlling for educational attainment.⁶⁵ Women with a bachelor's degree earn roughly equivalent to men with an associate's degree and earn 26 percent less than their male peers with a college degree.⁶⁶ Even in fields where women make up a substantial share of the workforce and controlling for experience, skills, education, race, and region, a wage gap remains.⁶⁷ Additionally, research demonstrates that when women move into a field of work in large numbers, wages decline.⁶⁸

Wage inequality experienced by mothers threatens the stability of families across the United States. Mothers now represent a larger share of the breadwinners for their families than in previous years, and this “is the continuation of a long-running trend, as women’s earnings and economic contributions to their families continue to grow in importance.”⁶⁹ In 2015, 64.4 percent of mothers in the United States were either the sole family breadwinner (42 percent) or the co-breadwinner (22.4 percent).⁷⁰ Meanwhile, mothers do not see the wage bump seen by fathers and in fact, statistics show that mothers receive a 7 percent penalty per child.⁷¹ Mothers on average are paid less than fathers, with mothers receiving 71 cents for every dollar a father earns, and low-wage working mothers see the biggest penalty of all groups in the workforce.⁷² The motherhood penalty is particularly staggering for Latina, African American, and American Indian/Alaskan Native mothers who are paid 46, 54, and 49 cents to the dollar, respectively, as compared to White non-Hispanic fathers.⁷³ Households headed by working mothers are also more likely to be in poverty than their single father counterparts. Only about one in four households headed by single mothers in the United States are economically secure.⁷⁴ Conversely, households headed by single fathers are nearly twice as likely to have incomes that provide economic security.⁷⁵ Eliminating pay inequality would cut the poverty rate for working single mothers in nearly half, from 28.9 percent to 14.5 percent.⁷⁶

The total increase in earnings by women through pay equity would be 16 times what the Federal Government and all state governments combined spent on Temporary Assistance to Needy Families (TANF) in Fiscal Year 2015.⁷⁷ Additionally, approximately 25.8 million children would benefit from the increased earnings of their

Pay discrimination is difficult to detect

In today's workplace, pay discrimination is often extremely difficult to detect. Discriminatory salary decisions are seldom obvious to employees because pay is often cloaked in secrecy.⁷⁹ As Justice Ginsburg observed in Ledbetter v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Company, Inc., "comparative pay information is often hidden from the employee's view."⁸⁰ This lack of transparency creates significant obstacles for employees to gather information that would indicate that they have experienced pay discrimination.⁸¹ Ultimately, this undermines an employee's ability to challenge pay discrimination.⁸² Also, many employers have policies prohibiting salary discussions.⁸³ About 60 percent of private sector employers have adopted specific rules prohibiting or strongly discouraging employees from discussing their wages with co-workers.⁸⁴ Finally, for those employees who do know what their colleagues earn, they often lack information about the contributing factors that might influence pay levels, such as performance, education, or training.

Disparate pay might not begin with a woman's initial salary determination, but can readily develop with a decision to increase the pay of male colleagues. Women risk being looked over for promotions and raises, the impact of which compounds throughout their careers.⁸⁵ "If your employer was paying you $5,000 less a year because you're a woman, that's a $50,000 loss over ten years."⁸⁶

Discussions about wages are necessary to identify pay disparity because "without this knowledge, [women] are unable to report these problems to the EEOC."⁸⁷ Once a lawsuit is filed, the discovery of wage data is available to help aggrieved employees develop their cases; however, in order learn more about employee salaries, women need to have some basis to file suit in the first place. Tens of thousands of pay discrimination charges were filed with the EEOC between 2010 and 2016, and the agency recovered over $85 million in monetary relief for victims. However, in her testimony at the Joint Subcommittee Hearing, Jenny Yang characterized these resolutions as "just the tip of the iceberg."⁸⁸

Lack of data on pay disparity

Data about pay discrimination is an invaluable tool for enforcement agencies such as the EEOC and the Office of Federal Contract Compliance Programs (OFCCP). Experts agree that these agencies currently receive minimal information about gender-based disparities in pay at the establishment level.⁸⁹

Bureau of Labor Statistics—Occupational Employment Statistics. For over forty years, the Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS) had been collecting data on female workers and comparing them to their male counterparts. This data had formed the basis for its monthly report on the employment situation.⁹⁰ In 2005, BLS stopped collecting this data, citing employer inconvenience.⁹¹ In response to this, Congress included in the Fiscal Year 2006, 2007, 2008, 2009, and 2010 Labor, Health and Human Services, Education, and Related Agencies appropriations bills that were enacted into law a provision requiring BLS to continue to collect data on women workers. However, beginning in Fiscal Year 2011 and continuing through Fiscal Year 2019, Congress did not include the requirement for BLS to collect data on women workers as part of the Current Employment Statistics (CES) survey. Recognizing the value of collecting these statistics, the Paycheck Fairness Act makes permanent a requirement for BLS to gather these statistics as part of the CES.

Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. The EEOC was created by the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and was given litigation enforcement authority in 1972.⁹² The EEOC has collected employment data categorized by race/ethnicity, gender, and job category through the Employer Information Report EEO-1 (EEO-1) from employers since 1966. The EEOC has also collected and maintained sensitive employer information gathered through its investigations since it opened its doors in 1965. Title VII requires that the EEOC keep this information confidential and imposes criminal sanctions on EEOC employees who unlawfully disclose confidential information.

In 2016, the Obama Administration expanded the data collection requirements for the EEO-1 to include, in addition to employment data, wage data disaggregated by race/ethnicity, gender, and job category. Collecting pay data can expose trends in the hiring, payment, and promotion of employees; the sex-segregation of jobs; and the inequity of salaries, benefits, or bonuses. Data may show that employees of the opposite sex are not paid comparably for the same job, or for different jobs that require similar skills, education, and experience. Some businesses may not be aware of the discriminatory practices until the data is collected and analyzed. Once these issues are brought to light, businesses can create interventions aimed at correcting or eliminating the problem before it even starts.

The Trump Administration indefinitely stayed the expanded pay data collection reporting requirements.⁹³ Additionally, the Trump Administration has delayed⁹⁴ the regular collection of the EEO-1 data.⁹⁵ The Paycheck Fairness Act requires the Department of Labor and the EEOC to collect data on compensation and other employment-related data by race, nationality, and sex in order to enhance the ability of both agencies to detect violations and improve enforcement of the EPA.

Office of Federal Contract Compliance Programs. The OFCCP is unique in that it is required by law to affirmatively conduct reviews to ensure that contractors with federal contracts are in compliance with equal employment measures, including Executive Order 11246, which prohibits discrimination in employment on the basis of race, color, religion, national origin, and gender. An estimated 4.1 million individuals work for an employer who contracts with the federal government.⁹⁶

Equal Opportunity Survey. The Equal Opportunity (EO) Survey was developed over three administrations to ensure nondiscrimination in federal contractor employment. It was intended to track employment data and to improve the enforcement of anti-discrimination requirements, including gender-based wage discrimination, on federal contractors.⁹⁷ Prior to the EO Survey, the OFCCP conducted targeted compliance reviews. Because of limited resources, the OFCCP only reviewed approximately four percent of contractors each year.⁹⁸

The EO Survey was designed to enable the OFCCP to be far more effective in detecting and remedying wage discrimination and encouraging self-awareness and self-evaluation among contractors as a means of increasing compliance.⁹⁹ It was developed to query employers on an annual basis (to be eventually sent to at least one-half of all contractors each year) about their affirmative action program activities, personnel actions (e.g., hires and promotions), and compensation of full-time employees, all aggregated by job group, race, and gender.¹⁰⁰

The first survey was sent out in 2000 during the last year of the Clinton Administration, but the Bush Administration that followed did not take any action on the surveys that were returned and did not follow up on those surveys that were not returned.¹⁰¹

In 2003 and 2004, the Bush Administration sent out fewer and fewer surveys, and in 2005 it failed to send out any at all. In January 2006, the OFCCP proposed eliminating the EO Survey altogether.¹⁰² The Obama Administration recognized that the gender pay gap continued to exist despite the prohibitions against gender-based pay discrimination. In May 2014, President Barack Obama issued a Memorandum instructing the Secretary of Labor to establish regulations requiring federal contractors and subcontractors to submit summary data on employee compensation, including data by sex and race.¹⁰³ However, this important data is still not being collected due to actions taken by the Trump Administration.¹⁰⁴ As Jenny Yang testified at the Joint Subcommittee Hearing:

During my tenure as Chair, the EEOC moved forward in September 2016 to collect summary pay data from employers with 100 or more employees to more effectively combat pay discrimination.¹⁰⁵ The data collection would have required these employers to provide confidential annual reports to the EEOC about employee pay, broken down by job category, sex, race, and ethnicity. Because the data would be disaggregated by sex, race, and ethnicity, the information would help to address the intersectional nature of pay discrimination for women of color. The data would help to address discrimination in the form of occupational segregation in lower paying jobs. Collecting this information would be a significant step forward in addressing pay discrimination.

The collection of employer pay data would support and enhance voluntary compliance by motivating employers to strengthen their systems and practices to collect and review compensation data. Many organizations still do not regularly collect and analyze pay data by demographics for potential disparities and have inconsistent or non-existent formal reviews. Because employers would need to compile and file this report, many more employers would establish a regular practice of reviewing their pay data by demographics at least at a summary level every year. Formalized and institutionalized pay data reporting would encourage employers to identify and address pay equity on their own—increasing the positive impact of reporting requirements. The EEOC also would publish aggregate pay information to enable employers to evaluate their pay data against industry benchmarks, consistent with its long-standing practice of reporting aggregate workforce demographic data.

Through extensive consultation with stakeholders, the EEOC sought to minimize the burden on employers by building on existing annual reporting requirements. The pay data collection enhances the existing Employer Information Report, also known as the EEO-1 report, to include pay information along with the workforce demographic information that has been collected for over fifty years. The EEOC and the Department of Labor have long used the EEO-1 workforce demographic data to identify trends, inform investigations, and focus resources. To report pay information, employers would provide data electronically, drawing from their existing human resources databases without incurring significant burden.

Despite this extensive process with two opportunities for public comment, the Trump Administration, after consulting with business groups, announced a “review and immediate stay” of the EEO-1 pay data collection in August 2017.¹⁰⁶ The Paycheck Fairness Act would address the critical need for better pay data by codifying a requirement for employers to report pay data, which would provide the EEOC with a powerful tool to better focus its resources to combat pay discrimination.¹⁰⁷

Standards in Conducting Systematic Wage Discrimination Analysis. As a way of measuring whether employers were engaged in gender-based wage discrimination, the Clinton Administration developed a methodology to be used in the OFCCP’s compliance reviews. The OFCCP asked employers to provide data on its pay levels (or pay grades), and then using the data, compare wages based on race, ethnicity, and gender. If there were any pay disparities, the OFCCP requested employers to correct them.

Generally, employers were not supportive of this analysis, arguing that differences in wages between men and women did not necessarily prove that they were engaging in gender-based discrimination. As a result, the Bush Administration published a formal guidance document that expressly prohibited the OFCCP from using a “pay grade” analysis in conducting its compliance reviews. Under this guidance, the OFCCP is required to conduct time-consuming analyses, including the gathering of anecdotal evidence before determining that a contractor is engaged in wage discrimination.¹⁰⁸

The Paycheck Fairness Act allows the use of “pay grade” analysis in conjunction with other tools the OFCCP can use in determining if non-construction contractors for federal contracts are engaged in gender based wage discrimination.

Women Are Less Likely to Negotiate

High numbers of women fail to negotiate for higher salaries and promotions.¹⁰⁹ Although lack of negotiation is a contributing factor to the wage gap, it does not justify gender-based pay discrimination. Researchers have discovered several reasons women fail to negotiate for themselves in the workplace. Women often do not promote their own interests, choosing instead to focus on others believing that employers will recognize and reward them for good work. Women tend to be more successful when negotiating for others—negotiating 18 percent greater salaries for others than they negotiate for themselves.¹¹⁰ ¹¹⁰Dina W. Pradel et al., When Gender Changes the Negotiation, Harvard Business School (Feb. 13, 2006), <https://hbswk.hbs.edu/item/when-gender-changes-the-negotiation>.

The hesitation of women to negotiate for themselves is not unreasonable. “Employers tend to penalize women who initiate negotiations for higher compensation more than they do men, as women are often judged more harshly for seeking higher pay than men.”¹¹¹ Even when women do negotiate, they often ask for less than their male counterparts.¹¹² H.R. 7 authorizes the Secretary of Labor to award competitive grants to eligible entities to provide negotiation skills training programs for the purposes of addressing pay disparities, including through outreach to women and girls.

Reliance on salary history perpetuates historic discrimination

Asking job applicants their prior salary history has long been a routine part of the hiring process. However, the practice of utilizing prior salary, or pay history, in the hiring process perpetuates gender and racial wage gaps in the workplace. Salary history is not an objective factor because it assumes that prior salaries were fairly established in the first place.¹¹³ Using salary histories, which may have been tainted by bias or impacted by gender-based wage discrimination, whether intentional or not, means that discriminatory pay follows workers wherever they go. As the EEOC’s Compliance Manual states, “[p]rior salary cannot, by itself, justify a compensation disparity. This is because prior salaries of job candidates can reflect sex-based compensation discrimination.”¹¹⁴

Ms. Rowe-Finkbeiner exemplified this perpetuation of wage discrimination during her testimony at the Joint Subcommittee Hearing when relaying the story of a woman named Julia:

Julia’s employer used her salary history as an excuse to reduce her pay. Julia was offered a job at $65,000 per year but when her offer letter arrived, she was offered just $55,000. It was for the same job, but not at the same salary. Julia was told the reason was her salary history. She decided to take the job anyway. In time, she asked a male colleague about his salary and learned he was being paid $62,000 for the same job. When Julia asked about the disparity, she was told her male colleague was fresh out of college and that’s what they decided to start him at. So he benefited from having no experience and no salary history, while her seven years of relevant experience was used against her. Salaries at her next two jobs were premised on her salary there, so the harm compounded over time. She’s lost tens of thousands of dollars to this discrimination, as have millions of other women in similar situations.¹¹⁵

Businesses often decide what to pay new hires based in-part, or in whole, on how much they earned from a previous job. This practice, however, may unduly exclude otherwise qualified individuals from the candidate pool. “A recent study demonstrated that em-employers are limiting their talent pools when they rely on salary history. When salary history information was taken out of the equation, the employers studied ended up widening the pool of workers under consideration and interviewing and ultimately hiring individuals who had made less money in the past.”¹¹⁶ Relying on a prospective employee’s skills and abilities rather than prior pay ensures that employers reduce past discrimination in the hiring and pay decision process.

THE EQUAL PAY ACT MUST BE STRENGTHENED TO EFFECTIVELY
ERADICATE PAY DISPARITY

The Paycheck Fairness Act strengthens the EPA as a tool to achieve pay parity by addressing the shortcomings described below.

Establishment

A plaintiff raising a claim under the EPA carries a heavy burden of proof in establishing a case for gender-based wage discrimination. To make out a prima facie case, a plaintiff must not only show that a pay disparity exists between employees of the same “establishment,” but she must also identify specific employees of the opposite sex holding equal positions who are paid higher wages.¹¹⁷ The courts have strictly defined the term “same establishment” to mean “a distinct physical place of business.”¹¹⁸ “This can be an obstacle for an employee who seeks to compare her job to a male employee who does the same work in a different physical location for the same employer in the same town.”¹¹⁹

The establishment requirement limits the ability of women to prevail in EPA claims since many women might not have a true comparator in their physical workplace. Today’s employers are much different than they were fifty-six years ago when the EPA was first enacted. Some employers may have multiple facilities at which the same jobs are performed. However, other locations may have only one person in a certain position (e.g., manager or supervisor), and employers have successfully asserted that women in higher-level positions have unique job duties and therefore have no comparator in the same establishment.¹²⁰

Georgen-Saad v. Texas Mutual Insurance Company illustrates the obstacle the establishment requirement creates for executive and professional women.¹²¹ In that case, the complainant was a senior vice-president of finance who was being paid less than the other senior-vice presidents in the company. The court rejected Georgen-Saad’s claim that any of the positions required “equal skill, effort, and responsibility,” and elaborated:

According to Defendant, there are no male comparators working in a position requiring equal skill, effort, and responsibility under similar working conditions. The Court agrees. The sealed exhibits filed with Defendant’s Motion for Summary Judgment include job descriptions for the Senior Vice Presidents of Investments, Insurance Services, Underwriting Services, Underwriting and Policy Holder Services, Public Affairs, Internal Audit, Benefits/Loss Prevention, Administration, Data Processing Services, and Branch Operations/Marketing.

The assertion that any one of these jobs requires “equal skill, effort, and responsibility” as Plaintiff’s Senior Vice President of Finance position cannot be taken seriously. These are Senior Vice Presidents in charge of different aspects of Defendant’s operations; these are not assembly-line workers or customer-service representatives. In the case of such lower level workers, the goals of the Equal Pay Act can be accomplished due to the fact that these types of workers perform commodity-like work and, therefore, should be paid commodity-like salaries. However, the practical realities of hiring and compensating high-level executives deal a fatal blow to Equal Pay Act claims.¹²²

In 1986, the EEOC issued regulations interpreting the definition of “establishment” under the EPA.¹²³ The regulation provides in part that an establishment can encompass more than a single physical establishment when the employer has a central administrative unit charged with making salary and employee decisions.

Courts have interpreted “establishment” to apply to different locations. In Grumbine v. United States,¹²⁴ the Court held that for purposes of the EPA, “the ‘establishment’ was the Civil Service in its entirety and that a woman could not be paid less than a man merely because she worked in a different location.”¹²⁵ The plaintiff in Grumbine was a Regional Counsel of Customs Service working in Baltimore, Maryland and was the only female among the nine Regional Counsels. The counsels were spread out among nine regions; however, the eight males were paid more than the one female counsel. Consequently, the plaintiff raised a claim of pay discrimination under the EPA. The government argued that the Regional Counsels each worked in different “establishments” for purposes of the EPA. The court rejected this defense and found, “[i]t would hardly make sense to permit an employer to rely on [the] geographic ‘establishment’ concept in defense of an equal pay practice when that employer has itself adopted a uniform, non-geographic pay policy, and system.”¹²⁶

In 2000, a Texas court¹²⁷ held that a female district sales manager in the Dallas/Fort Worth facility could compare herself to other district sales managers in the state of Texas for purposes of the plaintiff’s EPA claim. The plaintiff in the case had no comparator in her physical establishment. As a result, the court reasoned that limiting her comparators to a single physical establishment “would effectively permit a large employer with national operations to exempt its managerial staff (each of whom is in charge of a single facility) from the reach of the EPA.”¹²⁸ The Fifth Circuit held that a school district in Dallas with 182 schools was a single establishment for purposes of an EPA claim¹²⁹ as were 13 elementary schools operated by a single school district near Houston.¹³⁰

Numerous courts have recognized that there is a trend in the law interpreting “establishment” to include all places of business of one corporation or a multi-site employer.¹³¹ Under these circumstances, the courts have recognized that accountability flows from the decision-making structure. The single-location establishment interpretation is an unworkable standard in today’s workplace and threatens to eliminate a large number of women from the EPA’s protections.

Recognizing that the single-site “establishment” definition is linked to an outdated employer-employee system and that it has limited women’s ability to assert an EPA claim, H.R. 7 expands a worker’s opportunity to find a true comparator. Under the Act, a woman can look to a similarly situated male co-worker anywhere in the same county or similar political subdivision of a state. Workplaces in the same county operate under the same cost of living and labor market conditions. County-wide comparisons are already the law in Illinois under the state’s Equal Pay Act.¹³² However, consistent with EEOC rules and guidance, including 29 C.F.R. 1620.9, the Act does not restrict courts from applying establishment more broadly than the county.

ANY FACTOR OTHER THAN SEX

Under the EPA, employers can affirmatively defend and justify unequal pay if it is based on: (1) seniority systems; (2) merit systems; (3) systems that measure earnings by quality or quantity of production; or (4) “any factor other than sex.”¹³³ Historically, courts interpret the “any factor other than sex” criteria so broadly that it embraces an almost limitless number of factors, so long as they do not involve sex.¹³⁴ Employers have been able to prevail in EPA cases by asserting a range of “other than sex” factors.

Many courts have found that the “factors other than sex” need not be business-related or even related to the particular position in question.¹³⁵ Moreover, there is no consensus among the circuit courts as to whether a factor other than sex under the EPA needs to be business related, and the Supreme Court has failed to resolve this issue. The Court denied certiorari in the case of Randolph Cen-

In addition, under the “factors other than sex” defense, employers found to participate in gender-based wage discrimination are able to successfully raise factors such as market forces and prior salaries (even if they are based on a discriminatory wage) as defenses that, in themselves, undermine the goals of the EPA. In her testimony at the Joint Subcommittee Hearing, Jenny Yang explained to the Committee that “[c]onsideration of market forces shifts focus from the central question of whether an employer is providing equal pay for equal work. Bias can taint pay decisions when the employer assesses an artificially higher or nebulous ‘market value’ to male candidates.”¹³⁸

Courts continue to permit employers to defend equal pay claims based on market forces or differences in prior experience and qualifications despite Supreme Court precedent to the contrary. In 1974, the Supreme Court rejected the argument that employers should be permitted to pay women less than men on the basis of market forces. In Corning Glass Works v. Brennan, the Court recognized that the pay differential arose simply because men would not work at the low rates paid to women inspectors, and it reflected a job market in which Corning could pay women less than men for the same work.¹³⁹

If we are serious about eradicating the gender-based wage gap between women and men performing equal work, the EPA’s affirmative defense of “any factor other than sex” must be clarified to require that the factor be job-related, not derived or based upon a sex-based differential, and consistent with business necessity. A review of court cases reveals loopholes that the Paycheck Fairness Act will close.

Job-Relatedness. In Boriss v. Addison Farmers Insurance Company,¹⁴⁰ the plaintiff brought an EPA claim alleging that in the ten years she worked for the employer as an underwriter, she was paid less than her male colleagues while performing substantially equal work. When comparing the plaintiff to three of her male colleagues, the employer alleged that the difference in pay was due to factors other than sex, including more underwriting experience and college education, even though a college degree was not a prerequisite for the position.

The court found that the employer successfully met its burden; the difference in pay was due to a “factor other than sex.” The court noted that the higher salaries of the male employees were based on the pay they received at their prior employment.¹⁴¹ The court relied on a very broad interpretation of the “factor other than sex” and that the factor need not be related to the “requirements of the particular position in question, nor that it be a ‘business-related’ reason.”¹⁴² All that needs to be evaluated is “whether the factor is discriminatorily applied or if it causes a discriminatory effect.”¹⁴³

In addition, the court held that employers can lawfully pay a male more than a similarly situated female employee if the motivation is to induce the male worker to take the job and/or if employers take into account what the employee was making at his prior job.¹⁴⁴ Even though these situations may result in female employees being paid less, the court stated that none of these situations violate the EPA.¹⁴⁵

In Warren v. Solo Company,¹⁴⁶ the court reaffirmed its position that the defendant need not show that a “factor other than sex” is related to the requirements of the particular position or a “business-related” decision when it found that unequal pay is justified because the male employee had a college degree and two masters degrees, despite the fact that the degrees were unrelated to the jobs they were both performing.

Derived from or based upon sex-based differentials. In 1974, the Supreme Court held that “market forces”—such as the value given by the market to men’s and women’s work or the more effective bargaining power that men historically have—cannot be cited as a “factor other than sex” to evade liability.¹⁴⁷ The court in Corning Glass Works noted that the company’s decision to pay women less for the same work that men performed “took advantage of the market and was illegal under the EPA.”¹⁴⁸

Despite clear direction from the Supreme Court, lower courts have accepted market forces as a defense to a pay disparity.¹⁴⁹ In Merillat v. Metal Spinners, Incorporated,¹⁵⁰ the plaintiff, who was with the company for nearly 20 years, was promoted to a senior buyer position in the materials department. Around that time, the employer created a new position entitled “Vice President of Procurement and Materials Management.”¹⁵¹ While the duties of both jobs were similar, the new position also included managing materials department employees (including the plaintiff). The job was offered to a male with a starting salary of $62,500.¹⁵² At that time, the plaintiff earned $49,800, and she helped to train the new employee for his position.¹⁵³

The Merillat plaintiff brought an EPA claim against the employer who asserted the affirmative defense that the pay disparity was due to factors other than sex such as education, experience, and market forces. The employer alleged that the male hired to fill the new position was paid more, in part because of education and experience, but also because his salary represented the market rate for the position in question. The court agreed and held that the pay disparity was due to factors other than sex, including education, experience, and “the market forces at the time of [his] hire.”¹⁵⁴ The court noted that it previously “held that an employer may take into account market forces when determining the salary of an employee,”¹⁵⁵ although cautioning in a footnote against employers taking advantage of market forces to justify discrimination.

Similarly, the Third Circuit, in the case of Hodgson v. Robert Hall Clothes,¹⁵⁶ found that the employer was justified in paying the female workers less than the male workers because the “economic benefits to the employer justified a wage differential even where the men and women were performing the same task.”¹⁵⁷ In Hodgson, the court compared the higher wages of male salespeople working in the men’s department of a store with the lower wages being paid to female salespeople working in the ladies’ department.

In finding for the employer, the court based its decision on the fact that the men’s department was more profitable than the ladies’ department even though the products sold by the women were of lesser quality and cost less than the goods sold in the men’s department. It concluded, “[w]ithout a more definite indication from Congress, it would not seem wise to impose the economic burden of higher compensation on employers. It could serve to weaken their competitive position.”¹⁵⁸

Some courts hold that it is acceptable for an employer to pay male employees more than similarly situated female employees based on the higher prior salaries enjoyed by the male workers. In addition, employers can successfully justify paying a male employer more if the higher salary is a business tactic to lure or retain an employee.

In Drury v. Waterfront Media, Incorporated,¹⁵⁹ the plaintiff was hired as the Director of Project Management—responsible for organizing and managing all corporate projects—at a salary of $85,000 with an annual bonus of $15,000 and $25,000 in stock options (in her previous position, she had earned $85,000).¹⁶⁰ Over a year later she was promoted to Vice-President of Production and Operations with a salary of $95,000 and a bonus potential of $20,000.¹⁶¹

However, another vice-president (for customer service) was paid $110,000 with the possibility of a $25,000 bonus and $50,000 in stock options. This difference was the basis of the plaintiff’s equal pay claim. In asserting its affirmative defense, the employer claimed that it was forced to pay the male vice-president more, not based on any sex-based wage differential but in order to lure him away from his prior employer. The court agreed and held that “salary matching and experience-based compensation are reasonable, gender-neutral business tactics, and therefore qualify as a “factor other than sex.”¹⁶²

The same conclusion was reached in Glunt v. GES Exposition Services,¹⁶³ where the plaintiff brought a claim that her employer violated the EPA in two ways. First, she alleged that in her capacity as a project coordinator she was paid less than three male co-workers while performing essentially the same function. Second, she alleged that after being promoted to account executive, her employer failed to raise her salary to a level parallel to the starting salaries of the three male account executives. The court found that in each case, factors other than sex justified the employer paying Glunt less than her similarly situated male co-workers.

In its decision, the court noted that “offering a higher starting salary in order to induce a candidate to accept the employer’s offer over competing offers has been recognized as a valid factor other than sex justifying a wage disparity.”¹⁶⁴ Furthermore, “prior salary may be one of several gender-neutral factors employed in setting the higher salary of a male coming in from the outside.”¹⁶⁵ In cases where a male employee is transferred or reassigned, “it is widely recognized that an employer may continue to pay [a transferred or reassigned employee] his or her previous higher wage without violating the EPA, even though the current work may not justify the higher wage.”¹⁶⁶

Several other court decisions have similarly upheld such pay disparities. In Horner v. Mary Institute,¹⁶⁷ the Eighth Circuit allowed a private school to justify paying a male teacher it wanted to hire from the outside more pay because such payment was necessary to secure him for the position. In Engelmann v. NBC,¹⁶⁸ the court found that “salary matching” was a valid defense to pay disparity. In Sobol v. Kidder, Peabody & Company,¹⁶⁹ the court held that a pay disparity is permissible when an employer paid males more as a “premium to attract and hire talented new bankers.”¹⁷⁰

Finally, in Kouba v. Allstate Insurance Company,¹⁷¹ and Wernsing v. Department of Human Services,¹⁷² the courts allowed the employer to use prior salaries as a justifiable “factor other than sex.” In Kouba, the Ninth Circuit found that the employer had shown that the prior salary at issue corresponded roughly to “the employee’s ability . . . and predict[ed] a new employee’s performance as a sales agent,” while in Wernsing, the Seventh Circuit upheld the policy of the Illinois Department of Human Services that based its salary levels on prior earnings.

In all of these cases, the courts essentially relied upon “market forces” or “prior pay” arguments for pay differentials between men and women without requiring further evidence of the nature of that market force. Such evidence might include, for example, evidence that women's earnings in a given position are not frequently or consistently lower than men's, thereby demonstrating that the lower salary offered to a woman at hiring did not piggy-back on a sex-based differential. In some cases, "[m]arket forces may be a legitimate basis for determining pay, market forces tainted with sex discrimination are not."¹⁷³ The broadly remedial purpose of the EPA is undermined where a seemingly gender-neutral excuse for unequal pay between similarly situated employees of the opposite sex is based on or derived from a sex-based differential.

While the EPA affords employers opportunities to defend their practices, as previously explained, the "factor other than sex" defense under the EPA has been interpreted by the courts so broadly that nearly any explanation for a wage differential is acceptable.¹⁷⁴ This is one of the main loopholes found in the EPA that has perpetuated the gender-wage gap, and which the Paycheck Fairness Act resolves.

Business Necessity. Under Title VII, in order to justify an employment practice that has the effect of discriminating against an employee on the basis of race, color, religion, national origin, or sex (i.e., a disparate impact case), an employer must assert that the practice is consistent with business necessity. Like a disparate impact case under Title VII, cases brought under the EPA do not require a showing of intent. So, just as a practice (which includes the payment of wages) that may be "fair in form but discriminatory in operation"¹⁷⁵ is prohibited under Title VII, the same is true with regard to the EPA.

Both Title VII and the EPA afford the employer opportunities to defend their practices, but as previously explained, the "factor other than sex" defense under the EPA has been interpreted by the courts so broadly that nearly any explanation for a wage differential is acceptable. This is one of the main reasons that the EPA is ineffective.¹⁷⁶

The business necessity defense originated in the case of Griggs v. Duke Power Company,¹⁷⁷ decided in 1975. In that case, the Supreme Court determined that an employment practice that resulted in the exclusion of Black employees from certain jobs could only be justified in the case of "business necessity."¹⁷⁸ However, because the Court also introduced the concept of "job relatedness," and it appeared to use the two concepts interchangeably, there was some confusion over the years as what the correct standard should be.¹⁷⁹ This culminated in the case of Wards Cove Packing Company, Incorporated, et al. v. Antonio et al.,¹⁸⁰ where the Court abandoned the concept of business necessity altogether:

[T]he dispositive issue is whether a challenged practice serves, in a significant way the legitimate employment goals of the employer [citations omitted]. The touchstone of this inquiry is a reasoned review of the employer's justification for his use of the challenged practice. A mere insubstantial justification will not suffice . . . [a]t the same time, though, there is no requirement that the challenged practice be “essential” or “indispensable” to the employer’s business.¹⁸¹

Congress responded with the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1991, which overturned Wards Cove Packing and enshrined the business necessity defense into law in Title VII cases of disparate impact.¹⁸² Subsequent cases applying the business necessity standard illustrate that the more rigorous showing an employer must make to justify disparate treatment furthers the remedial purposes of Title VII.¹⁸³

The Paycheck Fairness Act strengthens the EPA by insisting that the “factor other than sex” defense be limited to a legitimate business purpose.¹⁸⁴ Requiring an employer to show that a job is consistent with business necessity applies a term that is already specifically defined in civil rights law and thereby provides workers and employers with a known legal standard for assessing pay disparities.¹⁸⁵

Class actions

The EPA requires plaintiffs to affirmatively “opt-in” to a collective action.¹⁸⁶ This is contrary to other employment discrimination laws, which allow women with a pay discrimination claim within a certified class to “opt-out” of a multiple-claim case pursuant to Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.¹⁸⁷ Title VII, for example, provides for claimants to “opt-out” of multi-party claims.¹⁸⁸

The current EPA rule excludes women who may not be aware they have a claim and also excludes women who may even be aware they have a claim but are afraid that they will be retaliated against in the workplace if they affirmatively opt-in. H.R. 7 puts claimants under the EPA in the same position as other victims of discrimination who automatically become part of a class-action unless they affirmatively opt-out of the class.¹⁸⁹

Damages

Damages under the EPA are limited to backpay and liquidated damages in the form of double back pay. No compensatory or punitive damages are available under the EPA, and liquidated damages may only be recovered if the employer fails to demonstrate good faith and reasonable grounds for believing it complied with the law.¹⁹⁰ By contrast, claims for discrimination based on race and national origin under Title VII permit successful complainants to recover compensatory and punitive damages, except that damages for gender based discrimination under Title VII are capped and cannot exceed $300,000.¹⁹¹ Caps under EPA and Title VII have created a two-tiered system that prioritizes remedies for wage discrimination based upon race and national origin over gender-based wage discrimination. The lack of punitive or compensatory damages, as well as caps on damages, does little to further the actual purpose of punitive damages, which is to punish the defendant and deter future misconduct by the defendant and others similarly situated.¹⁹²

“These limitations on remedies not only deprive women subjected to wage discrimination of full relief—they also substantially limit the deterrent effect of the Equal Pay Act.”¹⁹³ Fatima Goss Graves, testifying at the Joint Subcommittee Hearing, explained:

Limited remedies and damages caps mean that employers can refrain from addressing, or even examining, pay disparities in their workforces without fear of substantial penalties for this failure. Arbitrary limits on damages also encourage employers to frame the discrimination faced by women of color as only sex-based, and therefore subject to limitations—ignoring the complex nature of the discrimination employees have suffered.¹⁹⁴

The Paycheck Fairness Act provides for uncapped damages under the EPA so that damages for discrimination based upon sex are consistent with damages for discrimination based upon race and national origin.

The injustice of capped damages is illustrated in Brady v. Wal-Mart Stores, Incorporated.¹⁹⁵ In this case, the plaintiff Patrick Brady brought a suit against Wal-Mart and the store manager, alleging violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990 (ADA) and the New York Human Rights Law. In his suit, Brady, who has cerebral palsy, claimed Wal-Mart subjected him to adverse work conditions and a hostile work environment based on his disability. The jury agreed with Brady and awarded him a settlement for back pay and emotional pain and suffering, as well as a $5 million award in punitive damages. Unfortunately, the ADA’s remedies are capped, and the judge was required to reduce the award to $300,000.¹⁹⁶ In his opinion, Judge Orenstein stated that his ruling “respects the law, but it does not achieve a just result,”¹⁹⁷ especially for one of the biggest companies in America.¹⁹⁸

Punitive damages, especially uncapped punitive damages, are necessary to deter unscrupulous businesses from harming workers and consumers to gain a competitive advantage.¹⁹⁹ Often, without punitive damages, a business may treat its labor violations as merely a cost of doing business.

There is precedent for uncapped damages against employers who discriminate;²⁰⁰ damages awarded under Section 1981 for race or national origin discrimination are not subject to statutory limitations.

Still, even in those cases, courts generally do not award unjustifiable or excessive damages and instead base relief upon sound factors, such as the willfulness or egregiousness of the violation²⁰¹ and the effectiveness of damages as a deterrent.²⁰² Because decisions are made by each court on a case by case basis, courts can strike the needed balance between assessing damages based upon particular facts and circumstances and assessing the severity of the discrimination.²⁰³ The Paycheck Fairness Act provides for uncapped damages in order to strengthen the EPA as a vehicle for addressing unlawful pay disparities. Longstanding judicial discretion under Section 1981 directly addresses and alleviates concerns about frivolous and excessive claims for relief.²⁰⁴

Retaliation for discussing or disclosing salary information

The EPA does not explicitly protect employees who discuss or disclose salary information. As previously noted, many employers discourage and may even have workplace policies against sharing salary information among coworkers. This makes it extremely difficult to detect pay discrimination. For example, in Ledbetter v. Goodyear Tire,²⁰⁵ the plaintiff didn't discover that she was paid less than her male co-workers for years; company policy had prohibited her from discussing her pay with her co-workers. The only reason she discovered the pay discrimination was because someone sent her an anonymous note.²⁰⁶

As Fatima Goss-Graves testified at the Joint Subcommittee Hearing:

[A]ccording to the most recent data available, about 60 percent of workers in the private sector nationally are either forbidden or strongly discouraged from discussing their pay with their colleagues.²⁰⁷ As a result, employees face significant obstacles in gathering the information that would suggest that they have experienced pay discrimination, which undermines their ability to challenge such discrimination. Punitive pay secrecy policies and practices allow this form of discrimination not only to persist, but to become institutionalized.²⁰⁸

Employers are prohibited from retaliating against employees who seek to assert their rights under the FLSA. This protection extends to women claiming an EPA violation who have filed, instituted, initiated, or participated in any capacity in a proceeding under or related to the FLSA.²⁰⁹ However, in some cases interpreting the anti-retaliatory provision,²¹⁰ courts have limited the protection afforded by the anti-retaliation provision, particularly denying protection when they find that an aggrieved worker has not stepped outside her role representing the employer.

For example, in McKenzie v. Reinberg's Incorporated,²¹¹ the plaintiff alleged that she was fired in violation of the FLSA's anti-retaliation provision because she questioned whether her employer complied with the overtime provisions of the FLSA. The plaintiff was a personnel director who, as part of her job, monitored compliance with state and federal wage and hour laws. After attending a training on the FLSA, she determined that her employer was likely in violation of the law's overtime provisions. She brought this to her employer's attention and was fired as a result.²¹² The court held that because McKenzie merely articulated her concerns about the wage and hour violations with her employer:

[She] did not engage in activity protected under 215(a)(3). To qualify for the protections, the employee must step outside his or her role of representing the company and either file (or threaten to file) an action adverse to the employer, actively assist other employees in asserting FLSA rights, or otherwise, engage in activity that reasonably could be perceived as directed towards the assertion of rights protected by the FLSA.²¹³

A key component in eliminating the wage gap is protecting workers who discuss wages or participate in an EPA suit by ensuring that they can do so without fear of reprimand. Even when employers do not have explicit policies "legal or not, workers are expected to keep their lips sealed about their salaries. It's the unwritten law."²¹⁴ As one employer advised other employers, "sit down with people, talk to them . . . be clear: it's not OK to talk salary at the office."²¹⁵

H.R. 7 protects the rights of employees to discuss and disclose wage information with each other in the workplace and affirms the rights of workers to disclose this information as part of an employer or government investigation. Its provisions are intended to give robust protection to those employees who act to oppose violations of the EPA, as well as to provide a shield of protection for the kinds of discussions that will allow employees to uncover unequal pay. However, the Act recognizes that employers may entrust some employees with access to wage information as part of an essential function of their job. These confidential employees will not be protected for disclosing information about wages to those who do not otherwise have access to the information. However, they could: (1) disclose their own wages; (2) disclose wage issues “up the chain” or “horizontally” if they become aware of potential pay discrimination regarding other employees; or (3) disclose wages in response to or in furtherance of an employer or government investigation or other proceeding under H.R. 7.

Prior salary history

H.R. 7 provides:

It shall be an unlawful practice for an employer to (1) rely on the wage history of a prospective employee in considering the prospective employee for employment, including requiring that a prospective employee’s prior wages satisfy minimum or maximum criteria as a condition of being considered for employment; (2) rely on the wage history of a prospective employee in determining the wages for such prospective employee, except that an employer may rely on wage history if it is voluntarily provided by a prospective employee, after the employer makes an offer of employment with an offer of compensation to the prospective employee, to support a wage higher than the wage offered by the employer; (3) seek from a prospective employee or any current or former employer the wage history of the prospective employee, except that an employer may seek to confirm prior wage information only after an offer of employment with compensation has been made to the prospective employee and the prospective employee responds to the offer by providing prior wage information to support a wage higher than that offered by the employer.²¹⁶

With this provision, the Paycheck Fairness Act prevents employers from seeking or relying on a prospective employee’s wage or salary history that has been sought from the prospective employee or their former employer. The employer can only rely on the prospective employee’s prior wage if it is voluntarily provided by the prospective employee after the employer has made an offer of employment. The employer may seek a prospective (or current) employee’s wage history to confirm prior wage information after the employer has made an employment offer. The Act does not provide for a complete ban on the usage of an individual’s salary history.

H.R. 7’s requirements are similar to other anti-discrimination statutes like the ADA and the Genetic Information Nondiscrimination Act (GINA), which have been valuable tools in fighting against other forms of discrimination. The ADA prohibits employers from asking job applicants disability-related questions and forbids employers from relying on disability status in making employment decisions. Similarly, GINA prohibits employers from relying on genetic history when making an employment decision, and it also restricts employers' and employment agencies' ability to "request, require, or purchase genetic information" regarding applicants and employees or their family members.²¹⁷ Notwithstanding the minority witness' testimony at the February 13, 2019, hearing,²¹⁸ it should be noted that the provisions in the Paycheck Fairness Act are analogous to the pre-employment inquiry restrictions in GINA and the ADA. In all three cases, the restrictions on pre-employment inquiries are necessary to advance the government's compelling interest in eliminating unlawful discrimination.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Section 1. Short title

This section states that the title of the bill is the Paycheck Fairness Act (the Act).

Section 2. Findings

This section states that despite the enactment of the EPA, gender based-pay disparity still exists and some of the disparity is due to gender-based pay discrimination. Such disparity depresses wages of working families, undermines women's retirement security, negatively impacts commerce and the free flow of goods in commerce, and may deprive workers of equal protection on the basis of sex in violation of the 5th and 14th Amendments to the U.S. Constitution.

Decades after enactment of the FLSA and the Civil Rights Act of 1964, barriers to the elimination of sex-based wage discrimination still exist. The EPA has not worked as Congress originally intended, and modifications to the EPA are necessary to ensure protections to those who are subject to gender-based wage discrimination. Elimination of such barriers would solve problems in the economy created by such wage disparity, reduce dependence on public assistance, promote stable families, remedy the effects of past discrimination, and ensure equal protection under the 5th and 14th Amendments.

The Department of Labor and the EEOC have important and unique responsibilities to help ensure that women receive equal pay for equal work. With a stronger commitment by these entities, increased information as a result of the Amendments this Act makes to the EPA, wage data, and more effective remedies, women will be better able to recognize and enforce their rights.

Section 3. Enhanced enforcement of equal pay requirements

Bona Fide Factor Defense and Modification of Same Establishment Requirement. The Act amends the EPA by defining the statute's "any factor other than sex" employer affirmative defense as requiring employers to provide non-gender, business reasons for the difference in wages. The amended language lays out the requirement that to successfully raise this affirmative defense, an employer must demonstrate that the wage disparity is based on a bona fide factor other than sex, such as education, training, or experience. The differential must be: (1) not based upon or derived from a sex-based differential in compensation; (2) related to the position in question; (3) consistent with business necessity; and (4) fully accounted for in the compensation at issue. Such defense shall not apply if the employee can then demonstrate that her employer has an alternative employment practice that would serve the same business purpose without producing the pay differential, and the employer refused to adopt the alternative practice.

The Act broadens the definition of “establishment” used to compare compensation with the compensation of an employee of the opposite gender who performs substantially equal work. Under the Act, an establishment now includes workplaces located in the same county or similar political subdivision of a state. In addition, the Act allows broader applications of the term “establishment” as long as they are consistent with EEOC.

Nonretaliation Provision. The Act protects employees from retaliation for seeking redress, inquiring about an employer’s wage practices, or disclosing their own wages to coworkers. The Act provides that employers are prohibited from retaliating against employees who have made a charge, filed any complaint, or instituted any investigation, proceeding, hearing, or action under the EPA. Employers are also prohibited from requiring an employee to sign a contract or waiver that would prohibit the employee from disclosing their wages. Employees are protected from retaliation for initiating an employer investigation, or for testifying or participating in any sort of investigation, proceeding, hearing, or action. Employees are also protected from inquiries and discussions about each other’s wages.

The Act does not provide anti-retaliation protections to employees with access to wage information of other employees as an essential function of their job if they disclose that wage information to individuals who do not otherwise have access to this information. However, they would be protected if they were disclosing that wage information to someone who also has access to such information, or the disclosure was in response to a complaint or charge or in furtherance of an investigation, proceeding, hearing, or action under the EPA, including an internal employer investigation.

Enhanced Penalties. The Act provides that uncapped compensatory and punitive damages are available in private EPA suits and suits brought by the Secretary of Labor. The Act provides that class action lawsuits brought under the EPA shall proceed as opt-out class actions in conformity with the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, rather than the current law requiring plaintiffs to opt-in.

Section 4. Training

This section requires the EEOC and the OFCCP to provide training to EEOC employees and affected individuals on pay discrimination.

Section 5. Negotiation skills training Program Authorization. The Act authorizes the Secretary of Labor (after consultation with the U.S. Secretary of Education) to establish and carry out a grant program to provide negotiation skills training programs that aim to address all pay disparities, including through outreach to women and girls. Eligible entities apply to the Secretary of Labor to obtain grants. Eligible entities include states, local governments, state or local educational agencies, private nonprofit organizations, or community-based organizations.

Incorporating Training into Existing Programs. The Act requires the Secretary of Labor to issue regulation or policy guidance on how it will, to the extent practicable, integrate negotiation skills training into existing education and work training programs, including those authorized under the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, the Carl D. Perkins Career and Technical Education Act, the Higher Education Act, and the Workforce Innovation and Opportunity Act.

Report. The Act mandates the Secretary of Labor, in consultation with the U.S. Secretary of Education, to submit an annual report to Congress on the grant program.

Section 6. Research, education, and outreach

The Act requires the Secretary of Labor to conduct studies and provide information to employers, labor organizations, and the public on ways to eliminate pay disparities. This includes conducting and promoting research, publishing and making available findings from studies and other materials; sponsoring and assisting state and community informational and educational programs; providing information on the means of eliminating pay disparities; and recognizing and promoting achievements.

Section 7. Establishment of the National Award for Pay Equity in the Workplace

The Act establishes an annual award entitled the “Secretary of Labor’s National Award for Pay Equity in the Workplace” for an employer that demonstrates substantial effort in eliminating pay disparities by complying with the EPA. The Secretary of Labor will set the criteria for the award. Eligible employers include corporations (including nonprofit corporations); partnerships; professional associations; labor organizations; and entities carrying out educational referral programs or training programs.

Section 8. Collection of pay information by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission

This section requires the EEOC, within 18 months of enactment, to issue regulations to provide for the collection of compensation data, including hiring, termination, and promotion data, and other employment-related data from employers. This information will be disaggregated by the sex, race and national origin of employees. In collecting this data, the EEOC will consider the most effective and least burdensome means for enforcing the federal laws prohibiting pay discrimination, including the consideration of employer burden.

Section 9. Reinstatement of pay equity programs and pay equity data collection

Bureau of Labor Statistics. This section requires the continued collection by the Commissioner of Labor Statistics of gender-based data in the Current Employment Statistics survey.

Office of Federal Contract Compliance Programs. This section sets standards for the OFCCP in addressing systematic wage discrimination. It requires the OFCCP to use the full range of investigatory tools, including pay grade methodology, in considering evidence of possible compensation discrimination. It does not require the OFCCP to use multiple regression analysis or anecdotal evidence for these cases. It instructs the OFCCP to define similarly situated employees in a way that is consistent with the EEOC Compliance Manual and to consider only factors that were used in making compensation decisions in its enforcement activities. It directs the OFCCP to implement a yearly survey to collect compensation and other employment-related data. Finally, it directs the Secretary of Labor to distribute information and statistics to the public on wage discrimination.

Section 10. Prohibitions relating to prospective employees' salary and benefit history

This section makes it unlawful for employers to use wage history to decide whether to hire a prospective employee. Employers are prohibited from relying on or seeking a prospective employee's wage history to determine their wages. The employer can only rely on the prospective employee's prior wage if the employee voluntarily provides it after the employer makes an employment offer. Similarly, the employer may only seek a prospective employee's wage history to confirm prior wage information. The employer can obtain this information only after an employment offer (with compensation) has been made, and the employee responded by volunteering the prior wage information. An employer may not retaliate against an employee or prospective employee who has filed a complaint regarding the use of the salary history. Employers who violate this provision are subject to civil penalties.

Section 11. Authorization of appropriations

This section authorizes such sums as may be necessary to carry out the Act.

Section 12. Small business assistance

Effective Date. This section states that the Act and amendments made by the Act will take effect six months after the date of enactment.

Small Business. This section also requires the Secretary of Labor and the EEOC to jointly develop technical assistance materials to assist small businesses in complying with the Act. It further clarifies that to the extent small businesses are exempt from the FLSA, they will also be exempt from the Act.

Section 13. Rule of construction

This section states that nothing in the Act will affect the obligation of employers and employees to fully comply with all applicable immigration laws.

Section 14. Severability

This section adds a standard severability clause.

STATEMENT OF PERFORMANCE GOALS AND OBJECTIVES

Pursuant to clause (3)(c) of rule XIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives, H.R. 7 would strengthen current law in an effort to close the gender pay gap and provide more effective remedies to victims of discrimination in the payment of wages on the basis of gender.

DUPLICATION OF FEDERAL PROGRAMS

Pursuant to clause 3(c)(5) of rule XIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives, the Committee states that no provision of H.R. 7 establishes or reauthorizes a program of the Federal Government known to be duplicative of another federal program, a program that was included in any report from the Government Accountability Office to Congress pursuant to section 21 of Public Law 111–139, or a program related to a program identified in the most recent Catalog of Federal Domestic Assistance.

HEARINGS

Pursuant to section 103(i) of H. Res. 6 for the 116th Congress, the Committee held a legislative hearing entitled “Paycheck Fairness Act (H.R. 7): Equal Pay for Equal Work,” which was used to consider H.R. 7. The Committee heard testimony on: wage discrimination on the basis of gender; how weaknesses in current law have made it difficult to prevent gender-based wage discrimination; and remedies that would provide more effective relief to victims of discrimination on the basis of gender. The Committee heard testimony from: Congresswoman DeLauro; Congresswoman Holmes Norton; Congressman Beyer; Fatima Goss Graves, CEO and President of the National Women’s Law Center; Camille A. Olson, Partner at Seyfarth Shaw, LLP; Kristin Rowe-Finkbeiner, CEO of Moms Rising; and Jenny Yang, former EEOC Chair and Partner of Working Ideal.

STATEMENT OF OVERSIGHT FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE COMMITTEE

In compliance with clause 3(c)(1) of rule XIII and clause 2(b)(1) of rule X of the Rules of the House of Representatives, the Committee’s oversight findings and recommendations are reflected in the descriptive portions of this report.

NEW BUDGET AUTHORITY AND CBO COST ESTIMATE

Pursuant to clause 3(c)(2) of rule XIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives and section 308(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, and pursuant to clause 3(c)(3) of rule XIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives and section 402 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, the Committee has received the following estimate for H.R. 7 from the Director of the Congressional Budget Office:

U.S. CONGRESS,
CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE,
Washington, DC, March 12, 2019.

Hon. ROBERT C. "BOBBY" SCOTT,
Chairman, Committee on Education and Labor,
House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The Congressional Budget Office has prepared the enclosed cost estimate for H.R. 7, the Paycheck Fairness Act.

If you wish further details on this estimate, we will be pleased to provide them. The CBO staff contact is Meredith Decker.

Sincerely,

KEITH HALL,
Director.

The bill would
<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Amend federal statutes governing labor standards and wage discrimination • Increase civil penalties for violations of equal pay provisions • Authorize appropriations for research, education, public outreach, and data collection • Impose mandates by restricting employers' use of wage, salary, and benefit history
Estimated budgetary effects would primarily stem from <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Authorizing appropriations for the Department of Labor and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to undertake various activities to address wage discrimination
Detailed estimate begins on the next page.

Bill summary: H.R. 7 would revise the equal pay provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act and increase civil penalties for their violation. That law prohibits wage discrimination by employers on the basis of sex. Specifically, H.R. 7 would restrict the use of the bona fide factor defense to wage discrimination claims, enhance nonretaliation prohibitions, and prohibit contracts that disallow employees from disclosing their wages. Additionally, the bill would increase civil penalties for violations of wage discrimination provisions. Finally, the bill would authorize the appropriation of whatever amounts are necessary for the Department of Labor (DOL) and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) to conduct various activities to address wage discrimination.

Estimated Federal cost: The estimated budgetary effects of H.R. 7 are detailed in Table 1. The costs of the legislation fall within budget functions 500 (education, training, employment, and social services) and 750 (administration of justice).

Estimated Outlays	0	12	13	14	14	15	68

Enacting the bill also would increase revenues by an insignificant amount over the 2019–2029 period.

Basis of estimate: CBO assumes that the bill will be enacted early in 2020 and that the estimated amounts will be appropriated for each fiscal year. Estimated outlays are based on historical patterns for existing and similar activities. CBO estimates that under H.R. 7, DOL and the EEOC would need appropriations of $75 million over the 2019–2024 period, and that those appropriations would result in outlays of $68 million over the same period.

H.R. 7 would authorize DOL to undertake several activities related to wage discrimination. Based on similar programs within the Women’s Bureau in DOL, programs in the Office of Federal Contract Compliance, and information from the department CBO estimates that implementing the following measures would result in outlays of $44 million over the 2019–2024 period, assuming appropriation of estimated amounts. Those activities include:

- Surveying and collecting certain employment-related data from federal contractors ($15 million),
- Making competitive grants to state, local, and community organizations to provide women and girls with training in negotiation skills ($11 million),
- Conducting research, publishing educational materials, and sponsoring educational programs about wage discrimination ($8 million),
- Training affected individuals and providing technical assistance to help small businesses comply with the act ($6 million); and
- Establishing an annual National Award for Pay Equity in the Workplace ($4 million).

H.R. 7 also would direct the EEOC to provide training on wage discrimination issues and assist small businesses in complying with the bill’s requirements. CBO estimates those efforts would cost $5 million a year over the 2019–2024 period.

Pay-As-You-Go considerations: The Statutory Pay-As-You-Go Act of 2010 establishes budget-reporting and enforcement procedures for legislation affecting direct spending or revenues. CBO estimates that enacting H.R. 7 would increase federal revenues from the collection of new civil penalties. However, we estimate that such collections would be insignificant because of the small number of cases that the EEOC would likely resolve and because of the high degree of uncertainty about how employers would behave under the bill.

Increase in long-term direct spending and deficits: None

Mandates: CBO has not reviewed section 3 of H.R. 7 for intergovernmental or private-sector mandates. Section 4 of the Unfunded Mandates Reform Act (UMRA) excludes from the application of that act any legislative provisions that would establish or enforce statutory rights prohibiting discrimination. CBO has determined that the exclusion applies because section 3 would enforce protections against discrimination on the basis of sex.

Other provisions in H.R. 7 would impose intergovernmental and private-sector mandates as defined in UMRA by restricting employers' use of wage, salary, and benefit history. Specifically, under section 10 public and private employers could not:

- Rely on wage history in considering a person for employment,
- Rely on wage history in determining wages for a prospective employee,
- Seek the wage history of any prospective employee before an offer of employment is made, and
- Retaliate against employees who exercise their right to protections under section 10.

Those restrictions would not require covered employers to take any action and would not impose any direct cost. Therefore, CBO estimates that the cost of complying with the bill's mandates would fall below the annual thresholds established in UMRA for intergovernmental and private-sector mandates ($82 million and $164 million in 2019, respectively, adjusted annually for inflation).

The bill also would require the EEOC to issue regulations requiring large employers to report compensation data. That provision would not impose a mandate on large employers because such information already must be reported. CBO does not consider that provisions that codify existing regulatory practice are mandates because those regulations already carry the force of law.

COMMITTEE COST ESTIMATE

Clause 3(d)(1) of rule XIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives requires an estimate and a comparison of the costs that would be incurred in carrying out H.R. 7. However, clause 3(d)(2)(B) of that rule provides that this requirement does not apply when the committee has included in its report a timely submitted cost estimate of the bill prepared by the Director of the Congressional Budget Office under section 402 of the Congressional Budget Act.

CHANGES IN EXISTING LAW MADE BY THE BILL, AS REPORTED

In compliance with clause 3(e) of rule XIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives, changes in existing law made by the bill, H.R. 7, as reported, are shown as follows:

SEC. 6. (a) Every employer shall pay to each of his employees who in any workweek is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, or is employed in an enterprise engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, wages at the following rates:

(1) except as otherwise provided in this section, not less than—

(A) $5.85 an hour, beginning on the 60th day after the date of enactment of the Fair Minimum Wage Act of 2007;

(B) $6.55 an hour, beginning 12 months after that 60th day; and

(C) $7.25 an hour, beginning 24 months after that 60th day;

(2) if such employee is a home worker in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands, not less than the minimum piece rate prescribed by regulation or order; or, if no such minimum piece rate is in effect, any piece rate adopted by such employer which shall yield, to the proportion or class of employees prescribed by regulation or order, not less than the applicable minimum hourly wage rate. Such minimum piece rates or employer piece rates shall be commensurate with, and shall be paid in lieu of, the minimum hourly wage rate applicable under the provisions of this section. The Secretary of Labor, or his authorized representative, shall have power to make such regulations or orders as are necessary or appropriate to carry out any of the provisions of this paragraph, including the power without limiting the generality of the foregoing, to define any operation or occupation which is performed by such home work employees in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands; to establish minimum piece rates for any operation or occupation so defined; to prescribe the method and procedure for ascertaining and promulgating minimum piece rates; to prescribe standards for employer piece rates, including the proportion or class of employees who shall receive not less than the minimum hourly wage rate; to define the term "home worker"; and to prescribe the conditions under which employers, agents, contractors, and subcontractors shall cause goods to be produced by home workers;

(3) if such employee is employed as a seaman on an American vessel, not less than the rate which will provide to the employee, for the period covered by the wage payment, wages equal to compensation at the hourly rate prescribed by paragraph (1) of this subsection for all hours during such period when he was actually on duty (including periods aboard ship when the employee was on watch or was, at the direction of a superior officer, performing work or standing by, but not including off-duty periods which are provided pursuant to the employment agreement); or

(4) if such employee is employed in agriculture, not less than the minimum wage rate in effect under paragraph (1) after December 31, 1977.

(b) Every employer shall pay to each of his employees (other than an employee to whom subsection (a)(5) applies) who in any workweek is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, or is employed in an enterprise engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, and who in such workweek is brought within the purview of this section by the amendments made to this Act by the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966, title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, or the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1974, wages at the following rate: Effective after December 31, 1977, not less than the minimum wage rate in effect under subsection (a)(1).

(d)(1) [No employer having] (A) No employer having employees subject to any provisions of this section shall discriminate, within any establishment in which such employees are employed, between employees on the basis of sex by paying wages to employees in such establishment at a rate less than the rate at which he pays wages to employees of the opposite sex in such establishment for equal work on jobs the performance of which requires equal skill, effort, and responsibility, and which are performed under similar working conditions, except where such payment is made pursuant to (i) a seniority system; (ii) a merit system; (iii) a system which measures earnings by quantity or quality or production; or (iv) a differential based on [any other factor other than sex] a bona fide factor other than sex, such as education, training, or experience : Provided, That an employer who is paying a wage rate differential in violation of this subsection shall not, in order to comply with the provisions of this subsection, reduce the wage rate of any employee.

(B) The bona fide factor defense described in subparagraph (A)(iv) shall apply only if the employer demonstrates that such factor (i) is not based upon or derived from a sex-based differential in compensation; (ii) is job-related with respect to the position in question; (iii) is consistent with business necessity; and (iv) accounts for the entire differential in compensation at issue. Such defense shall not apply where the employer demonstrates that an alternative employment practice exists that would serve the same business purpose without producing such differential and that the employer has refused to adopt such alternative practice.

(C) For purposes of subparagraph (A), employees shall be deemed to work in the same establishment if the employees work for the same employer at workplaces located in the same county or similar political subdivision of a State. The preceding sentence shall not be construed as limiting broader applications of the term "establishment" consistent with rules prescribed or guidance issued by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

(2) No labor organization, or its agents, representing employees of an employer having employees subject to any provisions of this section shall cause or attempt to cause such an employer to discriminate against an employee in violation of paragraph (1) of this subsection.

(3) For purposes of administration and enforcement, any amounts owing to any employees which have been withheld in violation of this subsection shall be deemed to be unpaid minimum wages or unpaid overtime-compensation under this Act.

(4) As used in this subsection, the term "labor organization" means any organization of any kind, or any agency or employee representation committee or plan, in which employees participate and which exists for the purpose, in whole or in part, of dealing with employers concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours of employment, or conditions of work.

(e)(1) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 13 of this Act (except subsections (a)(1) and (f) thereof), every employer providing any contract services (other than linen supply services) under a contract with the United States or any subcontract thereunder shall pay to each of his employees whose rate of pay is not governed by the Service Contract Act of 1965 (41 U.S.C. 351-357) or to whom subsection (a)(1) of this section is not applicable, wages at rates not less than the rates provided for in subsection (b) of this section.

(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 13 of this Act (except subsections (a)(1) and (f) thereof) and the provisions of the Service Contract Act of 1965, every employer in an establishment providing linen supply services to the United States under a contract with the United States or any subcontract thereunder shall pay to each of his employees in such establishment wages at rates not less than those prescribed in subsection (b), except that if more than 50 per centum of the gross annual dollar volume of sales made or business done by such establishment is derived from providing such linen supply services under any such contracts or subcontracts, such employer shall pay to each of his employees in such establishment wages at rates not less than those prescribed in subsection (a)(1) of this section.

(f) Any employee—

(1) who in any workweek is employed in domestic service in a household shall be paid wages at a rate not less than the wage rate in effect under section 6(b) unless such employee's compensation for such service would not because of section 209(a)(6) of the Social Security Act constitute wages for the purpose of title II of such Act, or

(2) who in any workweek—

(A) is employed in domestic service in one or more households, and

(B) is so employed for more than 8 hours in the aggregate, shall be paid wages for such employment in such workweek at a rate not less than the wage rate in effect under section 6(b).
 (g)(1) In lieu of the rate prescribed by subsection (a)(1), any employer may pay any employee of such employer, during the first 90 consecutive calendar days after such employee is initially employed by such employer, a wage which is not less than $4.25 an hour.

(2) In lieu of the rate prescribed by subsection (a)(1), the Governor of Puerto Rico, subject to the approval of the Financial Oversight and Management Board established pursuant to section 101 of the Puerto Rico Oversight, Management, and Economic Stability Act, may designate a time period not to exceed four years during which employers in Puerto Rico may pay employees who are initially employed after the date of enactment of such Act a wage which is not less than the wage described in paragraph (1). Notwithstanding the time period designated, such wage shall not continue in effect after such Board terminates in accordance with section 209 of such Act.

(3) No employer may take any action to displace employees (including partial displacements such as reduction in hours, wages, or employment benefits) for purposes of hiring individuals at the wage authorized in paragraph (1) or (2).

(4) Any employer who violates this subsection shall be considered to have violated section 15(a)(3) (29 U.S.C. 215(a)(3)).

(5) This subsection shall only apply to an employee who has not attained the age of 20 years, except in the case of the wage applicable in Puerto Rico, 25 years, until such time as the Board described in paragraph (2) terminates in accordance with section 209 of the Act described in such paragraph.

MAXIMUM HOURS

SEC. 7. (a)(1) Except as otherwise provided in this section, no employer shall employ any of his employees who in any workweek is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, or is employed in an enterprise engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, for a workweek longer than forty hours unless such employee receives compensation for his employment in excess of the hours above specified at a rate not less than one and one-half times the regular rate at which he is employed.

(2) No employer shall employ any of his employees who in any workweek is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, or is employed in an enterprise engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, and who in such workweek is brought within the purview of this subsection by the amendments made to this Act by the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966—

(A) for a workweek longer than forty-four hours during the first year from the effective date of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966,

(B) for a workweek longer than forty-two hours during the second year from such date, or

(C) for a workweek longer than forty hours after the expiration of the second year from such date, unless such employee receives compensation for his employment in excess of the hours above specified at a rate not less than one and one-half times the regular rate at which he is employed.

(b) No employer shall be deemed to have violated subsection (a) by employing any employee for a workweek in excess of that specified in such subsection without paying the compensation for overtime employment prescribed therein if such employee is so employed—

(1) in pursuance of an agreement, made as a result of collective bargaining by representatives of employees certified as bona fide by the National Labor Relations Board, which provides that no employee shall be employed more than one thousand and forty hours during any period of twenty-six consecutive weeks, or

(2) in pursuance of an agreement, made as a result of collective bargaining by representatives of employees certified as bona fide by the National Labor Relations Board which provides that during a specified period of fifty-two consecutive weeks the employee shall be employed not more than two thousand two hundred and forty hours and shall be guaranteed not less than one thousand eight hundred and forty hours (or not less than forty-six weeks at the normal number of hours worked per week, but not less than thirty hours per week) and not more than two thousand and eighty hours of employment for which he shall receive compensation for all hours guaranteed or worked at rates not less than those applicable under the agreement to the work performed and for all hours in excess of the guaranty which are also in excess of the maximum workweek applicable to such employee under subsection (a) or two thousand and eighty in such period at rates not less than one and one-half times the regular rate at which he is employed; or

(3) by an independently owned and controlled local enterprise (including an enterprise with more than one bulk storage establishment) engaged in the wholesale or bulk distribution of petroleum products if—

(A) the annual gross volume of sales of such enterprise is less than $1,000,000 exclusive of excise taxes.

(B) more than 75 per centum of such enterprise's annual dollar volume of sales is made within the State in which such enterprise is located, and

(C) not more than 25 per centum of the annual dollar volume of sales of such enterprise is to customers who are engaged in the bulk distribution of such products for resale;

and if such employee receives compensation for employment in excess of twelve hours in any workday, or for employment in excess of fifty-six hours in any workweek, as the case may be, at a rate not less than one and one-half times the regular rate at which he is employed.

(e) As used in this section the "regular rate" at which an employee is employed shall be deemed to include all remuneration for employment paid to, or on behalf of, the employee, but shall not be deemed to include—

(1) sums paid as gifts; payments in the nature of gifts made at Christmas time or on other special occasions, as a reward for service, the amounts of which are not measured by or dependent on hours worked, production, or efficiency;

(2) payments made for occasional periods when no work is performed due to vacation, holiday, illness, failure of the employer to provide sufficient work or other similar cause; reasonable payments for traveling expenses, or other expenses, incurred by an employee in the furtherance of his employer's interests and properly reimbursable by the employer; and other similar payments to any employee which are not made as compensation for his hours of employment;

(3) sums paid in recognition of services performed during a given period if either, (a) both the fact that payment is to be made and the amount of the payment are determined at the sole discretion of the employer at or near the end of the period and not pursuant to any prior contract, agreement, or promise causing the employee to expect such payments regularly; or (b) the payments are made pursuant to a bona fide profit-sharing plan or trust or bona fide thrift or savings plan, meeting the requirements of the Secretary of Labor set forth in appropriate regulations which he shall issue, having due regard among other relevant facts, to the extent to which the amounts paid to the employee are determined without regard to hours of work, production, or efficiency; or (c) the payments are talent fees (as such talent fees are defined and delimited by regulations of the Secretary) paid to performers, including announcers, on radio and television programs;

(4) contributions irrevocably made by an employer to a trustee or third person pursuant to a bona fide plan for providing old-age retirement, life, accident, or health insurance or similar benefits for employees;

(5) extra compensation provided by a premium rate paid for certain hours worked by the employee in any day or workweek because such hours are hours worked in excess of eight in a day or in excess of the maximum workweek applicable to such employee under subsection (a) or in excess of the employee's normal working hours or regular working hours, as the case may be;

(6) extra compensation provided by a premium rate paid for work by the employee on Saturdays, Sundays, holidays, or regular days of rest, or on the sixth or seventh day of the workweek, where such premium rate is not less than one and one-half times the rate established in good faith for like work performed in nonovertime hours on other days;

In the case of employees described in clause (A)(ii) hired prior to April 15, 1986, the regular practice in effect on April 15, 1986, with respect to compensatory time off for such employees in lieu of the receipt of overtime compensation, shall constitute an agreement or understanding under such clause (A)(ii). Except as provided in the previous sentence, the provision of compensatory time off to such employees for hours worked after April 14, 1986, shall be in accordance with this subsection.

(3)(A) If the work of an employee for which compensatory time may be provided included work in a public safety activity, an emergency response activity, or a seasonal activity, the employee engaged in such work may accrue not more than 480 hours of compensatory time for hours worked after April 15, 1986. (6) The hours an employee of a public agency performs court reporting transcript preparation duties shall not be considered as hours worked for the purposes of subsection (a) if—

(A) such employee is paid at a per-page rate which is not less than—

(ii) the maximum rate otherwise established by a judicial or administrative officer and in effect on July 1, 1995, or

(3) If an individual who is employed in any capacity by a public agency which is a State, political subdivision of a State, or an interstate governmental agency, agrees, with the approval of the public agency and solely at the option of such individual, to substitute during scheduled work hours for another individual who is employed by such agency in the same capacity, the hours such employee worked as a substitute shall be excluded by the public agency in the calculation of the hours for which the employee is entitled to overtime compensation under this section.

(q) Any employer may employ any employee for a period or periods of not more than 10 hours in the aggregate in any workweek in excess of the maximum workweek specified in subsection (a) without paying the compensation for overtime employment prescribed in such subsection, if during such period or periods the employee is receiving remedial education that is—

(2) An employer shall not be required to compensate an employee receiving reasonable break time under paragraph (1) for any work time spent for such purpose.

(3) An employer that employs less than 50 employees shall not be subject to the requirements of this subsection, if such requirements would impose an undue hardship by causing the employer significant difficulty or expense when considered in relation to the size, financial resources, nature, or structure of the employer's business.

(4) Nothing in this subsection shall preempt a State law that provides greater protections to employees than the protections provided for under this subsection.

(a) In connection with any investigation of a charge filed under section 706, the Commission or its designated representative shall at all reasonable times have access to, for the purposes of examination, and the right to copy any evidence of any person being investigated or proceeded against that relates to unlawful employment practices covered by this title and is relevant to the charge under investigation.

(b) The Commission may cooperate with State and local agencies charged with the administration of State fair employment practices laws and, with the consent of such agencies, may, for the purpose of carrying out its functions and duties under this title and within the limitation of funds appropriated specifically for such purpose, engage in and contribute to the cost of research and other projects of mutual interest undertaken by such agencies, and utilize the services of such agencies and their employees, and, notwithstanding any other provision of law, pay by advance or reimbursement such agencies and their employees for services rendered to assist the Commission in carrying out this title. In furtherance of such cooperative efforts, the Commission may enter into written agreements with such State or local agencies and such agreements may include provisions under which the Commission shall refrain from processing a charge in any cases or class of cases specified in such agreements or under which the Commission shall relieve any person or class of persons in such State or locality from requirements imposed under this section. The Commission shall rescind any such agreement whenever it determines that the agreement no longer serves the interest of effective enforcement of this title.

(c) Every employer, employment agency, and labor organization subject to this title shall (1) make and keep such records relevant to the determinations of whether unlawful employment practices have been or are being committed, (2) preserve such records for such periods, and (3) make such reports therefrom as the Commission shall prescribe by regulation or order, after public hearing, as reasonable, necessary, or appropriate for the enforcement of this title or the regulations or orders thereunder. The Commission shall, by regulation, require each employer, labor organization, and joint labor-management committee subject to this title which controls an apprenticeship or other training program to maintain such records as are reasonably necessary to carry out the purposes of this title, including, but not limited to, a list of applicants who wish to participate in such program, including the chronological order in which applications were received, and to furnish to the Commission upon request, a detailed description of the manner in which persons are selected to participate in the apprenticeship or other training program. Any employer, employment agency, labor organization, or joint labor-management committee which believes that the application to it of any regulation or order issued under this section would result in undue hardship may apply to the Commission for an exemption from the application of such regulation or order, and, if such application for an exemption is denied, bring a civil action in the United States district court for the district where such records are kept. If the Commission or the court, as the case may be, finds that the application of the regulation or order to the employer, employment agency, or labor organization in question would impose an undue hardship, the Commission or the court, as the case may be, may grant appropriate relief. If any person required to comply with the provisions of this subsection fails or refuses to do so, the United States district court for the district in which such person is found, resides, or transacts business, shall, upon application of the Commission, or the Attorney General in a case involving a government, governmental agency or political subdivision, have jurisdiction to issue to such person an order requiring him to comply.

(d) In prescribing requirements pursuant to subsection (c) of this section, the Commission shall consult with other interested State and Federal agencies and shall endeavor to coordinate its requirements with those adopted by such agencies. The Commission shall furnish upon request and without cost to any State or local agency charged with the administration of a fair employment practice law information obtained pursuant to subsection (c) of this section from any employer, employment agency, labor organization, or joint labor-management committee subject to the jurisdiction of such agency. Such information shall be furnished on condition that it not be made public by the recipient agency prior to the institution of a proceeding under State or local law involving such information. If this condition is violated by a recipient agency, the Commission may decline to honor subsequent requests pursuant to this subsection.

(e) It shall be unlawful for any officer or employee of the Commission to make public in any manner whatever any information obtained by the Commission pursuant to its authority under this section prior to the institution of any proceeding under this title involving such information. Any officer or employee of the Commission who shall make public in any manner whatever any information in violation of this subsection shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not more than one year.

(f)(1) Not later than 18 months after the date of enactment of this subsection, the Commission shall issue regulations to provide for the collection from employers of compensation data and other employment-related data (including hiring, termination, and promotion data) disaggregated by the sex, race, and national origin of employees.

(2) In carrying out paragraph (1), the Commission shall have as its primary consideration the most effective and efficient means for enhancing the enforcement of Federal laws prohibiting pay discrimination. For this purpose, the Commission shall consider factors including the imposition of burdens on employers, the frequency of required reports (including the size of employers required to prepare reports), appropriate protections for maintaining data confidentiality, and the most effective format to report such data.

MINORITY VIEWS

INTRODUCTION

Committee Republicans are united in their belief that equal work should be rewarded with equal pay, irrespective of a worker's sex. Indeed, that very principle has been the law of the land for decades. It is already—as it should be—against federal law to discriminate, in pay or other employment practices, on the basis of sex. Committee Republicans are committed to eliminating unfair and illegal wage disparities that are a product of workplace discrimination to ensure a fair, productive, and competitive workforce.

In 1963, Congress enacted the Equal Pay Act (EPA) within the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA). The EPA makes it illegal to pay different wages to workers of the opposite sex for equal work. One year later, Congress enacted comprehensive anti-discrimination civil rights protection based on race, color, national origin, religion, and sex under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act. Together, these laws protect against sex discrimination and provide a range of remedies for victims. In short, the question is not whether sex discrimination in the workplace should be permitted. That question has been answered as Committee Republicans agree that such discrimination should not be tolerated, which is why it is a direct violation of not one but two federal laws.

It is against this backdrop that Committee Republicans reject H.R. 7, the so-called Paycheck Fairness Act. Simply put, H.R. 7 does little to protect the wages and paychecks of American workers and does far more to line the pockets of the plaintiffs' trial-lawyer bar. First, the bill dramatically limits and likely eliminates the ability of business owners to defend claims of discrimination based on pay differences that arise from lawful and legitimate business purposes, while radically expanding liability and damages under the EPA. The bill also obstructs the recruitment and hiring process by restricting use of information related to a prospective employee's current compensation. Further, the bill requires a burdensome, intrusive, and unnecessary government collection of questionable utility of worker pay data. The data is broken down by race, sex, and national origin, and raises significant confidentiality and privacy concerns. For these reasons, and as set forth more fully below, Committee Republicans are united in their opposition to H.R. 7.

CONCERNS WITH H.R. 7

Committee Republicans identify the following as some of the bill's most objectionable provisions:

H.R. 7 Dramatically Limits Legitimate and Lawful Defenses

H.R. 7 dramatically scales back and likely eliminates a business owner's ability to defend itself from claims of pay discrimination where disparities arise from wholly lawful business decisions. For example, H.R. 7 strictly limits a business owner’s ability to defend pay differentials that are accounted for by reasons wholly unrelated to a worker’s sex. Under current law, a business owner can defend him or herself from a claim of pay discrimination by proffering evidence and convincing a trier of fact that the differential is based not on sex, but on another factor. H.R. 7 dramatically and unfairly curtails the scope of that defense and requires that a business owner convince a judge or jury, potentially years later, that the reason was required by “business necessity”—essentially putting courts in charge of determining what a business owner must do to avoid going bankrupt. Ms. Camille A. Olson, a partner at Seyfarth Shaw LLP, explained at the only hearing on H.R. 7 why requiring proof of “business necessity” is unworkable:

Business necessity suggests that the very viability of the business is dependent upon the compensation decision. Requiring an employer to prove that a wage differential between two individuals is a business necessity is unworkable. It would require an employer to meet an impossible threshold—to prove that it is a business necessity for the employer to pay one person more than another based on innumerable intangible criteria such as relative levels of education, experience, or job performance. . . . This highly onerous standard would place an unrealistic burden on employers that would be virtually impossible to achieve.¹

Further, H.R. 7 requires the business owner to justify the entire pay difference between a male worker and female worker. This is yet another unworkable standard. Business owners make compensation decisions based on many factors that are not easily quantifiable. Requiring businesses to explain every cent of a pay differential could only be satisfied by rigid pay grades, as governments use for civil servants. Ms. Olson commented on how this provision in H.R. 7 is also unworkable:

Compensation decisions in the private sector are made based on a variety of factors that are not capable of an exact dollar-for-dollar comparison. Differences in experience, education and performance, among other job-related factors, matter significantly for purposes of setting compensation. How would an employer ever be able to explain that it credited an employee with X dollars for their 6.3 years of prior experience, and Y dollars because the candidate went to a top tier school versus Z dollars for a mid-tier school? It will be virtually impossible for employers to meet such a standard.²

Even more egregious, if a business owner somehow persuades the factfinder that 100 percent of the differential was not based on sex, an employee is still entitled to argue that there are other ways to address this business need without a pay differential. In short,

¹*Paycheck Fairness Act (H.R. 7): Equal Pay for Equal Work: Hearing on H.R. 7 Before the Subcomm. on Civil Rights and Human Serv. and Subcomm. on Workforce Protections of the H. Comm. on Educ. and Labor, 116th Cong. (2019) (statement of Camille Olson, Partner, Seyfarth Shaw LLP, at 8).*

H.R. 7 takes core management decisions out of the hands of business owners and places them squarely in the realm of judges, juries, and trial lawyers. This brazen attack on market economies and on private-sector discretion must be rejected.

Moreover, H.R. 7 significantly limits the ability of business owners to justify differences in pay based on different work locations (as has been the case throughout the 56-year history of the EPA). Rather, under the bill as reported, an employee can compare his or her pay to any other coworker in the same county or political subdivision (or perhaps more broadly, given the bill's provision allowing for the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) to define "work establishment" even more broadly) to prove pay discrimination. Ms. Olson pointed out in her testimony that a county can include urban and suburban areas with different commuting costs that could justify a pay differential.³ The practical elimination of a legitimate defense available to business owners under current law simply fails to recognize economic reality and our market-based economy.

H.R. 7 Radically Expands Remedies

H.R. 7 radically expands remedies under the EPA to provide for unlimited compensatory damages, even where there is absolutely no showing that any pay disparity was the effect of intentional discrimination, as well as uncapped punitive damages. In doing so, H.R. 7 places claims of discrimination in wages based on sex in a more favorable position than similar claims of pay discrimination under Title VII or the Americans with Disabilities Act, which properly provide for limited compensatory and punitive damages. Indeed, taken in concert with the remedies available under Title VII, remedies for claims of pay discrimination under H.R. 7 would be greater than those available under any of our nation's current civil rights laws. Ms. Olson discussed in her testimony why these expanded remedies are inappropriate:

The required showing for proof of an EPA violation is lower than under Title VII, but the available damages are higher. What is more, H.R. 7 would also allow for uncapped punitive damages in addition to the EPA's existing double recovery of economic damages. The current damage mechanisms under the EPA serve their intended purpose of eliminating wage disparities, making employees whole, compensating employees with an equal amount of special liquidated damages, and paying all attorneys' fees and costs. These remedies are appropriately proportional as a remedy for an employer's actions that produce unintentional, unlawful wage disparities. To upend this design through a contortionist's attempt to carry over parts of Title VII's remedial scheme in a selected manner, and expand damages under lower proof requirements is not appropriate.⁴

This radical expansion of remedies, particularly where they may be assessed without showing any discriminatory intent, tips the scales to favor outsized judgments unrelated to actual damages, and calls the entire rationale for the bill into question.

H.R. 7 Encourages Frivolous Class Action Lawsuits

Perhaps nowhere is this bill's true intent—to generate more lawsuits and to line the pockets of trial lawyers—made more evident as in its provisions expanding class action lawsuits. Currently, under the FLSA, plaintiffs may sue on behalf of themselves and those similarly situated, and thereby pursue a collective action. To ensure that these suits are merit-based—and brought by those who wish to pursue them—workers must opt in to these collective suits. H.R. 7 reverses that presumption and eliminates those safeguards, instead deeming all potential class members to be joined to a suit, placing the affirmative burden on these plaintiffs—who may not even know of the suit's existence—to opt out of a claim.

Supporters of H.R. 7 have not adequately explained why a change is needed for collective actions under the EPA. Ms. Olson reached the conclusion that “the current mechanism sufficiently balances the interests of employers and aggrieved employees, and the proponents of the bill have not sufficiently demonstrated a need for such a procedural overhaul.”⁵ The class action provisions in the bill are plainly designed to ensure that plaintiffs' lawyers get handsome financial payoffs to pursue class-action lawsuits, trumping any legitimate interest in protecting the paychecks of American workers, and these special-interest provisions should be rejected.

H.R. 7 Obstructs Recruitment and Hiring

H.R. 7 includes highly prescriptive prohibitions relating to recruitment and hiring. The bill prohibits a business owner from relying on the current or previous wage of a prospective employee in considering the individual for employment or determining the wages of the individual unless the individual voluntarily provides the wage information after a job offer has been made. These restrictions are included even though, as Ms. Olson notes in her testimony, courts and the EEOC have said that wage information can be a legitimate factor in determining current wages because it can accurately reflect job-related ability or qualifications. Ms. Olson elaborated on legitimate uses of wage information:

Employers routinely rely on prior salary information for competitive purposes as a way to gather real time market data. It is also used to benchmark against the pay of current employees or to target offers to top performing employees at competitor firms. It can also be used as an indicator of a candidate's experience, performance or level of expertise in an area.⁶

Ms. Olson further explained how H.R. 7 obstructs recruitment and hiring:

Prohibiting employers from relying on prior salary information, even if it's voluntarily provided, until after an offer that includes compensation information has been extended will invoke an unnatural cadence that does not reflect the realities of the workforce. Indeed, human resources representatives will be forced to issue “Miranda-type” warnings to applicants advising them that they cannot provide information regarding prior salary The only effect that the current proposal is guaranteed to have are steeper recruiting costs which will be borne by both employers and applicants.⁷

H.R. 7 additionally prohibits a business owner from seeking wage information from a prospective employee or any current or former business owner. A similar provision in a City of Philadelphia ordinance has been struck down as violating the First Amendment speech rights of business owners.⁸ The judge wrote that the Philadelphia City Council’s evidence that prohibiting business owners from inquiring about wage information could reduce discrimination was based on “unsubstantiated conclusions,” and the court found a lack of evidence that knowing an individual’s wage information results in discrimination:

[N]one of the testimony addressed why asking about wage history necessarily results in the perpetuation of an initial discriminatory wage. Moreover, no witness cited to evidence that prior wage history inquiry contributes to a discriminatory wage gap.⁹

Likewise, H.R. 7 lacks a basis for its assumption that a business owner seeking wage information will perpetuate discriminatory compensation or that prohibiting this practice will reduce unlawful, gender-based pay discrepancies.

H.R. 7 Eliminates business owners’ ability to protect the confidentiality of wage and salary data

H.R. 7 attempts to further undermine the ability of business owners to manage their enterprises by adopting broad new anti-retaliation provisions relating to discussions of pay or compensation, extending protection far beyond the scope of protection already provided to employees under federal law. Title VII among other federal civil rights laws protect employees from asserting their rights with respect to nondiscrimination in pay. The National Labor Relations Act also protects employees who discuss their wages as part of a concerted activity.

However, H.R. 7 effectively eliminates the ability of a business owner to maintain any policy protecting the privacy and confidentiality of its payroll and wage information, even for supervisory and managerial employees, long considered to be part of the legitimate management of a business. Ms. Olson explained the problems with this open-ended provision:

H.R. 7 is written so broadly that employees would have the right to inquire about, discuss, or disclose wage information without limitation There is no consideration of the reasonableness of the employee's actions with respect to their inquiries, discussions, or disclosures, nor is the permissibility of such action tethered to the alleged underlying pay disparity. Further, the proposed bill does not take into account or protect the privacy rights of other employees with respect to publicly disseminating information about their pay, nor does it contain a mechanism for balancing and protecting employers' legitimate business concerns in maintaining confidentiality of certain compensation information. Under H.R. 7, an employee who chooses to post on social media the wages of all other employees, by name, would be deemed to be engaging in protected activity, against which other employees and the employer would have no recourse.

These provisions of the bill contain no limiting principle and will very likely harm workers and business owners, and they should be defeated.

H.R. 7 Mandates intrusive government collection of worker pay data

H.R. 7 directs the EEOC, for the first time ever, to collect compensation data from business owners disaggregated by the sex, race, and national origin of workers, including hiring, termination, and promotion data. This collection would go further than the Obama administration proposal in 2016 to collect pay data,¹⁰ which did not include hiring, termination, and promotion data.

As with the Obama administration proposal, this mandate raises serious privacy and confidentiality concerns. Time and again there have been massive and harmful data breaches of federal agencies. This data would create yet another valuable target, and H.R. 7 fails to address how the data will be protected. Aggregated data published at the regional and industrial level could reveal salaries of individual workers, which is proprietary data. The EEOC would also share the data with the Department of Labor, which could release sensitive data pursuant to a Freedom of Information Act request.

It is highly unlikely that the data in question will be useful to the EEOC or the public. To the extent pay discrimination exists, it is doubtful that amassing pay data in this manner will effectively combat such discrimination. The raw data collected will not account for the many factors that may explain pay differences, such as skill levels and regional differences in compensation, and will result in information that is misleading and confusing.

Finally, this mandate is uniquely burdensome. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce estimated that the annual burden of complying with the current EEOC Employer Information Report (EEO-1) if pay data were added to the report would be between $693 and $729 million.¹¹

In addition to the intrusive government collection of pay data, the previous section of this report has summarized substantive concerns with changes to the EPA contained in H.R. 7 that make it impossible to defend legitimate pay differences, improperly allow unlimited compensatory and punitive damages, and inappropriately expand class actions, as well as obstructing the recruiting and hiring process. These concerns represent but a few of the most egregious policy flaws in H.R. 7. There are numerous others, ranging from the ill-conceived resurrection of flawed statistical models at the Department of Labor's Office of Federal Contract Compliance Programs to the creation of new negotiation skills "training" programs that have yet to be shown necessary and have a paternalistic view toward workers. Whether singly or taken as a whole, the provisions of H.R. 7 should be rejected.

THE FLAWED "WAGE GAP" THEORY

Advocates of H.R. 7 claim that despite two federal laws prohibiting pay discrimination, female workers are still paid on average considerably less than male workers, and, as a result, a pernicious "wage gap" exists. According to Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS) data, female weekly earnings were 82 percent of male weekly earnings in 2017, as compared to 62 percent in 1979.¹² Supporters of H.R. 7 argue that this flawed theory makes enactment of the bill necessary.

However, many experts effectively argue the "wage gap" between men and women is not necessarily the product of workplace discrimination. In fact, most of the gap disappears when factors such as hours worked per week, rate of leaving the labor force, and industry and occupation are considered.¹³ For example, among full-time workers, men are more likely than women to choose to work more than 40 hours per week. In 2017, 25 percent of men who usually work full time worked 41 or more hours per week, compared with 14 percent of women. For those who worked exactly a 40-hour workweek, women earned 88 percent as much as men.¹⁴ Factoring work experience, job tenure, and preferences for non-wage benefits, such as health insurance and other fringe benefits, also further reduces the gap.¹⁵

A 2018 Harvard University study found that the gap in pay between female and male bus and train operators working for the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority (MBTA) can be explained by the workplace choices that women and men make rather than other factors such as discrimination.¹⁶ The study found that the earnings gap for MBTA bus and train operators is explained by the fact that the male operators took 48 percent fewer unpaid hours off and worked 83 percent more overtime hours per year than the female operators. These differences are not due to any different work options faced by female and male operators. Rather, the study found that the female operators had a greater demand for workplace flexibility and a lower demand for overtime work hours than the male operators.

The Harvard MBTA study is noteworthy because the workplace characteristics of the female operators are entirely comparable to those of the male operators. All operators are represented by the same union, and all are covered by the same collective bargaining agreement. The study found the earnings gap persists even when seniority was the same, which means that differences in choices that women and men made when faced with the same options in the MBTA workplace can fully explain the earnings gap. Because of the strict seniority system, the study debunked discrimination as a cause of the gender earnings gap at the MBTA.

In sum, there is a lack of definitive evidence that a “wage gap” exists which is caused by gender-based discrimination in pay. The flawed premise of the “wage gap” does not justify the enactment of radical, sweeping reforms to the EPA and other federal laws contained in H.R. 7.

REPUBLICAN AMENDMENTS

Recognizing the fundamental failures of policy contained in H.R. 7, Committee Republicans offered several amendments during Committee markup to highlight Republican priorities and solutions for working women and men.

To demonstrate just how far afield the Majority has gone with this legislation, Representative Bradley Byrne (R-AL) offered two common-sense amendments during the Committee’s consideration of H.R. 7. The first amendment offered by Representative Byrne underscored the true beneficiaries of this bill—the trial lawyers’ lobby. Under the FLSA (and unchanged by H.R. 7), a successful plaintiff may recover a “reasonable” attorney’s fee. Representative Byrne’s amendment would simply have provided that if a plaintiff entered into a contingency fee arrangement, the attorney’s contingency fee cannot exceed 15 percent of the judgment awarded the plaintiff to be considered “reasonable.” Democrats unanimously rejected the simple proposition that no trial lawyer can “reasonably” be paid a contingency fee of more than 15 percent of the judgment awarded to the plaintiff.

Representative Byrne’s second amendment would have strengthened the EPA while eliminating the multiple provisions in H.R. 7 that make it impossible for a business owner to defend a pay differential. This amendment strengthened the EPA by replacing the “any factor other than sex” defense with the language “a bona fide business-related reason other than sex.” This change would make clear to the courts that the “other than sex” defense cannot be used as a loophole or excuse for relying on sex as a factor when there is a pay differential. The Byrne amendment also struck the remaining provision in H.R. 7 relating to defenses. These unnecessary provisions require that, even when a business owner already shows the factor causing the pay differential is “other than sex,” it must meet several illogical and insurmountable burdens, effectively paving an unimpeded path to the promise of unlimited punitive and compensatory damages to line the pockets of trial lawyers. Committee Democrats unanimously rejected this amendment that would have strengthened the EPA while eliminating the unworkable provisions that would make it impossible for a business owner to defend legitimate business practices.

A third amendment would have ensured H.R. 7 does not harm the very people it is supposedly aimed at helping. H.R. 7 escalates liability, eliminates a business owner's ability to contest gender-based pay discrimination cases, dramatically expands damages, and encourages frivolous litigation. As a whole, the bill will limit or obstruct business owners' efforts to recruit, hire, and promote workers, and to increase their pay. In addition, to avoid the unlimited liability created by this bill, business owners will be hesitant to reward merit and success on the job, which will harm workers by restricting their opportunities for increased compensation. H.R. 7 will likely force business owners to use rigid compensation formulas, such as those used in government employment.

In response to these fundamental flaws in H.R. 7, Representative Rick Allen (R-GA) offered an amendment directing the Secretary of Labor to study and certify the effects of the bill's changes to the EPA on business owners' ability to recruit, hire, promote, and increase the pay of workers, and report back to the Congress within 90 days. Under the amendment, these provisions in H.R. 7 would not become effective until Congress receives and is given 90 days to review the Secretary's report. Further, the amendment provides that the EPA changes in the bill will not take effect if the Secretary of Labor determines that they "significantly hinder" business owners in recruiting, hiring, promoting, and increasing the pay of workers, irrespective of gender. Democrats unanimously rejected this prudent amendment that would ensure the bill doesn't make it harder for workers to find jobs and get pay raises.

Committee Republicans offered a final amendment reflecting their grave concerns with the government collection of pay data mandated in H.R. 7. The bill requires the EEOC, for the first time ever, to collect worker compensation data from business owners broken down by sex, race, and national origin of employees, including hiring, termination, and promotion data. This astounding government collection of worker pay data raises significant privacy and confidentiality concerns. Further, the utility of this data is questionable, and it is doubtful the EEOC would be able to manage and interpret this massive amount of pay data appropriately. Finally, the data collection requirement would impose an extremely costly and uniquely burdensome mandate on business owners with reams of proprietary data being provided to the government, the uses of which are not adequately explained in the bill. Representative Virginia Foxx (R-NC), the Committee's Republican Leader, offered an amendment to strike this pay data collection from the bill, which the Democrats unanimously rejected.

CONCLUSION

H.R. 7 is a fundamentally flawed bill that does nothing to ensure "paycheck fairness." The bill's proponents have failed to demonstrate that its provisions are needed or will prove workable. H.R. 7 is instead a gift for trial lawyers, who are the main beneficiaries of the bill. For these reasons, and all of those set forth above, we oppose enactment of H.R. 7 as reported from the Committee on Education and Labor.
