

with the Caribbean region, particularly in the context of safety and security, development and crime," Clarke said. "As far as I know, there hasn't been this level of recognition given to the responsibility and the type of bridge building that need to take place between the United States and the Caricom nations."

The resolution doesn't have the force of law but expresses the mood of the chamber. It was approved about a week ago and Clarke expects it to open the door to assistance from Washington at a crucial time.

"Typically when the House passes a resolution of this type, the State Department is usually close behind it in terms of its role and responsibility," she said. "We expect support, not only in the House and the Senate but in the executive branch, the Administration. Definitely, it could influence the flow of funds and technical support to the Caribbean."

Dr. Griffith, the author of a number of books on Caribbean security, said that two economic pillars of the region, tourism and agriculture were under threat from crime and violence because they have the potential to raise doubts about people's personal safety and their foreign direct investment.

Of course, there is oil in Trinidad and Tobago, bauxite in Jamaica and Guyana but as a region tourism and agriculture define the economic landscape of the Caribbean," he said. "Crime and security jeopardize those in dramatic ways. Jamaica is unique in a sense, but I am not sure for how long to have had a significant crime and security challenge but at the same time it has been doing fairly well in tourism. The general economic livelihood of the Caribbean very much revolves around having relative peace and stability."

As he sees it, the problem comes down to the degree of crime, the extent of drug trafficking and the prevalence and availability of weapons, all of which can undermine "the basic tenets" that influence the flow of long-term foreign investment in the various island-nations and coastal states.

The York College Provost warned that the negative news media coverage of the Caribbean, portraying it as a major center for crime and violence could make the various destinations far less appealing to tourists than at any other time.

"It raises the question if tourists are going to want to come to a region that is getting negative press day-in-and-day-out," he asked. "When someone in Europe sees a story about a particular country, he or she would see the Caribbean as a whole, not the individual destination. The region's long-term survivability makes crime and violence a clear and present danger."

He gave the heads of government good marks for confronting the problem but warned that many of the ideas approved in Port of Spain, including special crime fighting and management teams; improved training; introduction of sophisticated equipment; and the availability of mobile law enforcement units would take considerable amounts of financial resources and time to get off the ground. The upshot: moving the plans from the drawing board to reality would result in a time lag that the region could ill-afford.

"The challenge becomes translating the statement into practical reality," was the way Dr. Griffith, who advises western hemisphere and other international institutions on security question, put it. "The statement's truisms undermine some of the practical dimensions involved."

For instance, the decision to establish counter-kidnapping units and response teams and negotiators would "take a while to plan and deliver" and would involve foreign countries and quite a lot of money.

"The training necessary for them and the recruitment that's also necessary would require going beyond the Caribbean boundaries, getting the money to do that. I am not sure that the legislation to give effect to the proposals exists in the Caribbean," he added. "That would mean making legislative accommodations domestically to accommodate some of these worth them on their dedicated service and I humbly welcome these men and their families to Kansas City.
